My Vision

A Girl Sees Herself and Fears Her Mind Is Giving Way

By Edna T. Wilcox

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911.

There is a moment in my life that I can never forget. Can you guess what it is? A death scene? No. A proposal of marriage? No. A terrible accident? No. Well, what is it?

The seeing of my own individual self in duplicate.

I was sitting at a typewriter in an office where I was at the time employed, and, happening to look out into the court, there on the other side of the quadrangle at a window one story beneath me stood my own individual person. The only difference between my other self and me was in the dress. I, sitting at my typewriter, was in plain office costume; I in the other part of the building was richly clad in street dress.

I dropped my work, rose from my seat and, pale and trembling, went to my employer and asked to be excused for the rest of the day. He saw by my appearance that something of moment had happened and at once granted my request. He asked me if I would tell him what had troubled me, and I said:

"ONE DAY I SAW IT AGAIN."

"Shortly before coming to your employ I suffered a nervous breakdown and passed several months in a sanitarium. I was discharged as perfectly well, but a few moments ago I suffered a relapse."

"How were you affected?" he asked.

"I saw— Oh, don't ask me. I can't tell you what I saw. It was something ordinary, but it was awful."

Now, my employer, Edward Wheeler, had treated me since I came into his service with great consideration. Indeed, it seemed to me at times that I was becoming more to him than merely his typewriter. We were in his private office with no one else present, and, seeing that I needed soothing, he spoke to me in a quiet voice, taking my hand in his. The touch rather than the words quieted me. Placing me in an easy chair, he said:

"Tell me more about this matter."

I told him how I had seen myself at an opposite window.

He attempted to reassure me by saying that I had seen another person. I told him that if this was the explanation there would have been some difference between the two, however slight. Was it not more reasonable to suppose, since I had suffered from similar visions before, that this one was the effect of a physical weakness?

He did not assent to this, but refrained from arguing with me, saying that if I desired it he would call a carriage and send me home, but he thought it would be better for me to occupy my mind with my work. If I had had any relative in the world, any home to go to, I would have declined his advice. As it was I accepted it. He recommended my remaining where I was for awhile, and as there was a comfort in having him near me I was glad to do so. He handed me a newspaper, then went on with what work he had before him. I sat there for half an hour, during which persons came and went. Then, feeling better, I returned to my desk and to work.

Mr. Wheeler did not mention this matter to me again for several days; then one morning when standing beside me with some papers he wished me to copy, looking out into the court, he said:

"At which window did you see your double?"

I pointed to the window, but he made no further remark and, turning, went away.

Very gradually my vision, as I called it, ceased to trouble me, or, rather, came more and more rarely into my mind, and when it did I was better able to put it away from me. I had quite recovered when one day I saw it again.

When I say that I met my other self on the street, that my other self passed me, reflecting my own look, and that I was again seized with terror, it must be remembered that I was in an overstrung condition. It is easy for a normal person to say, "Why didn't you go to her and say something?" My answer is that I believed her to be a creation of my own brain, an evidence that I was again suffering from what I feared might result in madness.

I was out at lunch at the time and on my way back to the office. As soon as I reached it I went to Mr. Wheeler and, sinking into a chair, said in an almost inaudible whisper:

"I have seen it again."

This time he gave me a different treatment. Instead of the sympathetic soothing I had received from him before he treated me with severity.

"Nonsense!" he said. "You've seen a real person. You are working yourself up to a frenzy by thinking your brain is in an abnormal condition."

"How could this be when my other self reflected the expression on my own face?"

"The other person was doubtless as much astonished as you."

I declined to be convinced.

"I was in hopes," he added, "that you would not see the person for awhile, for I believe that an explanation is forthcoming. I have only this morning come upon an advertisement which I think bears on the case."

"An advertisement!" I exclaimed.

"Yes. I was debating with myself whether if I should speak to you about it I would throw you into hysterics."

"Hysterics! Why should it?"

"Oh, you are all nervished up and ready to twist anything into evidence that you are losing your mind. Sit down there," pointing to a chair. "I wish to ask you some questions."

I seated myself, wondering what was coming.

"Did your aunt ever tell you anything about your parentage?"

"Not much. I was very sensitive. She died when I was quite young. I knew there was something very unpleasant—a family skeleton—and I dreaded to know it."

"You are Edith Webster, and you were called Polly by your father and mother."

"How do you know that?"

"Never mind. Your father and mother were divorced about a year after you were born."

"Is that the skeleton?"

"You were retained by your mother, who died when you were four years old. Do you remember her?"

"No."

"Your aunt took you at your mother's death. Your father disappeared, supposedly to get rid of paying the alimony fixed by the court at the time of the divorce. Your aunt had nothing to leave you; consequently you are earning your living as a typewriter."

"How did you come to know all this?"

"I came to know it from my interest in you. When you told me that you had seen your double I felt sure you had seen some real person who resembled you. You may remember that I asked you at what window you had seen your vision. Well, I went into the office to which that window belongs and made inquiries."

"What did you find out?"

"Not all I wish to know. You are too emotional for me to give you all my confidence just at present. I can only say now that I expect to prove that the person you saw is a woman and not a creation of your brain."

I begged him to tell me more, but he would not, and I was forced to go to work unsatisfied. I consequently blundered all the afternoon. Though I was reassured, one thing troubled me—Mr. Wheeler's severe treatment of me. And yet I felt that it had done more to enable me to shake off my nervousness than when he had sympathized with me. Indeed, he told me afterward that he knew I needed just such treatment.

A few days later Mr. Wheeler came to my desk and told me to come into his private office. At the same time he looked at me with a kindly smile and added:

"I have a surprise for you. You mustn't let it shock you."

Wondering, I went with him. I found in his office a man and a woman.

Great heavens! The woman was my vision.

She came toward me with outstretched arms. I drew back in fright.

"Don't be afraid of me, Polly. I'm Dolly, your twin sister. Father often talked to me about you and said that 'when his ship came in' he would find you for me. He died just as the ship came in, and I have been hunting for you ever since."

She put her arms about me, and my head sank down on her shoulder. She patted me affectionately and said:

"I don't wonder you have been wrought up over seeing me. When we met on the street the other day, although I have been long looking for you, I was so startled that I let you pass. I turned back at once, but had lost you in the crowd. You don't seem as strong as I am, but you won't have to work any more. We're rich. Father left half to you—that is, if you were alive and I could find you. When father and mother separated mother took you and father took me. You have the same rights as I."

As soon as my sister and I withdrew from our embrace I turned to look at Mr. Wheeler. His eyes were bent on me with an expression that went straight to my heart. I put out my hand to him impulsively and returned his glance with one of the same kind.

"Without his interest in the matter I doubt if we would have ever got together," said my sister.

Gradually all the details came out, and I heard how Mr. Wheeler had learned of my sister's presence in the city and had seen her advertisement for me. Dolly and I are both now married. I married my employer. I am in excellent health and have no fear of seeing any more visions.

My experience goes to show the power of the mental faculties over the bodily. I verily believe that had the matter not been brought to a climax I should have been a nervous wreck.
