We have experienced a mournful calamity, here, in witnessing the passing away of some of our best immigrants. Although I was not present, during their expiring moment, yet I have been authentically informed that God and Liberia were the last subjects of their reflections. Mr James, whom you will remember as Ruby's assistant and as Topsey's father, embraced death with a serene submission which impressed his friends that he left this world without a regret, to enjoy the brighter realities of another sphere. He was a man of undaunted spirits and persevering energy; of which character we seldom recognize among men who are reared under similar depressions and sent abroad under the same circumstances. He had built, by his individual labor, a small house, in which he had collected his family; and for the first period in his life enjoyed domestic bliss. His wife's mother, shortly after, was returned to the dust and her spirit to the God who gave it. Poor [illegible] by immigrants, and an industrious man, in the meridian of life and state of celibacy; [illegible] after he had erected his house and planted [illegible] welcomed, without any apparent [illegible] messenger of eternity. Among the [illegible] who attended school [illegible] of emulation and learn[illegible] really astonishing. He was [illegible], and by far the best school[illegible] more than any other for [illegible] the person who would
