WIRELESS SUMMONS AID TO SINKING SHIP

Vessels For Hundreds of Miles Speed to Rescue of the Doomed Titanic.

STORY OF VESSEL'S END

New York, April 16.—The Titanic, of the White Star Line, most gigantic and most luxurious of steamships ever built, is lying on the floor of the Atlantic, two miles between the surfact of the waves, 600 miles southeast of Halifax, and just below the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, victim of a collision with an iceberg.

Last Tuesday, the $10,000 000 leviathan sailed from England on her maiden trip bearing between 2,100 and 2,300 souls. There were on board men and women who were worth millions. Down in the lower part of the great vessel were hundreds of passengers in the steerage, to whom life was as sweet as it was to those who occupied the palatial staterooms of the upper deck.

Bands played as the monster glided from its wharf and pointed its nose toward the English Channel and the broad Atlantic. Flags fluttered from the masts and stacks of the proud vessel. As she plowed her way toward the open sea hundreds of other vessels, looking like pygmie beside her vast hulk, saluted the giant ocean liner.

To-day the Titanic is sunk 2 miles deep and of the more than 2,000 of her passengers and crew, there are living only some 800 or 1,000. Nearly all of them are women and children. The remainder, the men, stood back until the feeble and helpless had been taken care of and went down with the ship.

It is uncertain how many of the passengers and crew of the noble vessel are among the survivors. This will not be known definitely until the ships which went to the rescue and picked them from the small boats wallowing in the deep arrive and a comparison of lists is made.

As in other catastrophes of the sea in recent years, the wireless again played its part in the rescue of the helpless. But on this occasion the wireless was too slow, destruction too swift, to permit of all being saved.

Ships Rush To Rescue.

To the far off station at Halifax the message flashed, bearing to those on land the first intimation of threatening catastrophe.

Following the first call there was sent through the air the appeal:

"Have struck an iceberg; rush aid."

As the message was received, the Virginian turned about and under its greatest pressure of steam, rushed toward the stricken ship. Other greyhounds heard the message.

The Hamburg-American liner Cincinnati; the Parisian, from Glasgow; the North German Lloyd liner Prinz Friedrich Wilhelm, the Hamburg-American liners Prinz Adelbert and Amerika, all turned their prows toward the location in which the Titanic reported itself to be.

Hastening westward was the Olympic, also of the White Star Line, and, until the Titanic began its cruise a few days before, the greatest of all ocean steamships. It, too, caught the appeal.

The Virginian was nearest, barely 170 miles away. Farther out at sea was the Cunarder Carpathia, which left new York Saturday for the Mediterranean. This vessel, when the fateful word came into the wireless operator's office, turned about in its course and headed for the wounded Titanic.

In all, the boats had capacity for between 600 and 900 passengers. The latest reports indicate that more than 800 were rescued.

Hundreds of frantic last messages were exchanged between those who stayed on board and those who were carried away in the small boats. Women screamed to their husbands, and then dropped to the bottom of the boats and prayed.

Once at a safe distance the small boats remained within sight of the Titanic. They had not long to wait. At 2 o'clock it was evident that the end was a matter of moments only. Then the bow of the boat took a sudden dip downward. The stern reared itself into the air. There was a great splash and rush of waters, and the Titanic, queen of the seas, whose reign had lasted only a few days, dived to her grave.

It was a scene of pitiful disaster which greeted those on board the Carpathia and Virginian when they arrived hours later. Scattered among the floes of ice were the little boats, filled with the survivors.

Of the Titanic there was nothing to be seen, but here and there, floating on the surface, were pieces of ship's furniture and other articles, many of which, doubtless, had served as floating rafts for some of the passengers, until benumbed by cold, they gave up the fight and dropped into the water.

The task of the vessels was a long and dangerous one. It was only with difficulty and careful manoeuvering that they succeeded in getting those who were in the boat safely on deck.

The Carpathia, first of the rescuing steamships to arrive, took on board the passengers. The Virginian and other vessels that were rushing to the rescue, secured among the fields of ice in the hope that they might recover from floating cakes some of the passengers of the Titanic who had found rescue there.
