SALE OF MYSTERY SHIP

Dry Officials Are To Attend Auction Of Boat Found Near Betterton On Monday In Baltimore.

Government officials have been busy in an attempt to straighten out the affairs of the Palma Conga, mystery ship, which was found abandoned in the Chesapeake bay, off the shores of Betterton, Kent county, early last December. With neither master reaching the Government it is uncertain as to the owner but it is whispered that there might have been liquor aboard before the good ship, 56 feet in length with seven foot beam and five feet draft, went astray.

Not long ago United States Marshal Stockham advertised sale of the vessel, which is scheduled under order of Judge Rose in the United States Court for next Monday. Wilbur Walbert found the pretty craft on his shore near Worton creek when she was cast on the rocks after two days observation. He is said to have found nothing that might have stirred any whisky sense in his make-up.

Now comes a story of kidnapping and other stirring events, which have aroused to greater activity the alert Government sleuths. A New York lawyer was reported to be in town making inquiries about the situation but he was not located. Anyhow, Marshal Stockham declares he will carry out the court order of sale next Monday as the vessel lies at port in Canton Hollow.

Walbert reported last December that he observed the abandoned craft for two days before it was washed on the rocks of his shore by stormy winds. When he towed her to safety he did his best to restore the ship to something near its original condition.

Then he went into the United States Court with a petition in admiralty for money spent in salvage. The United States Marshal was ordered to take the craft into custody. For a long time, the vessel remained at Still Pond in Kent county, with armed deputies watching her every shift. Then she was towed to Baltimore last Thursday week.

How the vessel, said to carry an engine valued at from $3000 to $5000, found its way to Kent waters nobody is ready to explain. One theory is that she made her way there from the West Indies with much booze which left many a headache in its wake along the Eastern Shore.
