CHESTERTOWN - JAN. 11, 1890.

The Prevention of Cruelty to Mothers.

"Can you help me a few minutes Marion?"

"I would like to but I don't see how I can." The tone was not impatient, but hurried, "I have this essay to finish for the society this evening, I must go to our French history class in an hour, then to a guild meeting, and get back to my German lesson at five o'clock."

"No, you can't help me dear. You look worn out yourself. Never mind. If I tie up my head, perhaps I can finish this."

"Through at last," said Marion, wearily, giving a finishing touch to "The Development of Religious Ideas among the Greeks," at the same time glancing quickly at the clock. Her attention was arrested by a strange sight. Her tired mother had fallen asleep over her sewing. That was not surprising, but the startled girl saw bending over her mother's pale face two angels, each looking earnestly at the sleeper.

"What made that weary look on this woman's face?" asked the stern, strange-looking angel of the weaker, sadder one. "Has God given her no daughters?"

"Yes," replied the other, "but they have no time to take care of their mother."

"No time!" cried the other. "What do they do with all the time I am letting them have?"

"Well," replied the Angel of Life, "I keep their hands and hearts full. They are affectionate daughters, much admired for their good works; but they do not know they are letting the one the most loved slip from my arms to yours. Those grey hairs come from overwork, and anxiety to save extra money for the music and French lessons. Those pale cheeks faded while the girls were painting roses and pansies on velvet or satin."

The dark angel frowned.

"Young ladies must be accomplished now," explained the other. "Those eyes grew dim sewing for the girls, to give them time to study ancient history and modern languages; those wrinkles came because the girls had no time to share the cares and worries of everyday life. That sigh comes because their mother feels neglected and lonely, while the girls are working for the women of India; that tired look comes from getting up so early, while the poor exhausted girls are trying to sleep back the late hours they gave to study or spent at the concert; those feet are so weary because of their ceaseless walk around the house all day."

"Surely the girls help too?"

"What they can. But their feet get weary enough going round begging for the charity hospital and the church, and hunting up the poor and sick."

"No wonder," said the Angel of Death, "so many mothers call me. This is indeed sad—loving, industrious girls giving their mother to my care as soon as selfish, wicked ones!"

"Ah, the hours are so crowded," said Life wearily. "Girls who are cultured, or take an active part in life, have no time to take care of the mother who spent so much time in bringing them up."

"Then I must place my seal on her brow," said the Angel of Death, bending over the sleeping woman.

"No! no!" cried Marion, springing from her seat; "I will take care of her if you will only stay!"

"Daughter you must have nightmare—wake up, dear. I fear you have missed your history class."

"Never mind, mamma, I am not going to-day. I am rested now, and I will make those buttonholes while you curl up on the sofa and take a nap. I'll send word to the guild professor that he must be excused to-day, for I am going to see to supper myself and make some of those muffins you like."

"But dear, I dislike to take your time."

"Seeing you have never given me any time. Now go on to sleep, mamma dear, as I did, and don't worry about me. You are of more consequence than all the languages or classes in the world."

So, after having been snugly tucked in a warm Afghan, with a tender kiss from her daughter, usually too busy for such demonstrations, Mrs. Henson fell into a sweet, restful sleep.

"I see we might have lost the best of mothers in our mad rush to be educated and useful in this hurrying, restless day and generation," Marion soliloquized, as she occasionally stole a glance at the sleeping mother. "After this, what time she does not need I shall devote to outside work and study. Until she gets well restored I will take charge of the house, and give up all the societies except one—that I'll have myself, if the other girls won't join—a society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Mothers."

And Marion kept her word. A few months later one of the woman-rights class remarked to her: "We miss your bright essays so much, Miss Marion. You seem to have lost all your ambition to be highly educated. You are letting your sisters get ahead of you, I fear. How young your mother looks to have grown daughters! I never saw her looking so well."

Then Marion felt rewarded for being a member of what she calls the "S. P. C. M."

Successful Colored Farmer.

There is a colored farmer residing near Middletown who is spoken of and looked up to by his own race as well as a great many white people as a man who has had remarkable success in this world. He has been a farmer for over twenty years past, and during that time has bought a farm and also owns excellent stock. He has a family of fourteen children living and two have died. The most remarkable thing is the way his large family of children are being educated. He sent his eldest son to a college somewhere in New Jersey, where he acquired a fairly good education. The farmer then went to work and built a suitable building for a school-house on the farm he occupies and his eldest son is installed as teacher of his brothers and sisters. The school is opened up in the fall, when the farm work is all done, and in the spring, when the planting season commences, the school is closed. His boys, who are large enough to help their father, then get to work, and only in the most busy season is hired help necessary. This, perhaps, is the main cause of his success as a tiller of the soil.

THE GRANT MONUMENT.—Ex-Gov. Cornell is quoted as saying that work on the Grant monument at Riverside Park will begin next spring, and that "the association will spend one million dollars." As the monument fund, after the most urgent appeals and persistent drumming, amounts to date to only $140,000, it would seem that ex-Gov. Cornell is over-sanguine in his predictions unless the projectors of the monument propose to go ahead and trust to the future for funds to pay for it.

THE ring of gold is often the knell of friendship.

For the Kent News.

DEAR NEWS:—I hope you have had a merry Christmas, including the big turkey donated by some considerate friend, to help lift any shadow that may have hung upon the editorial brow; not that you need, but deserve such kindly remembrance. And we wish you a happy new year, and dear me how close together the new years seem to get.

The warm weather continuing to this date has allowed the farmers ample opportunity to get their field work in this section all done up in good time and order; also the mechanics to have a good run of work without interruption clear up to Christmas. The carpenters and masons have been especially busy.

The usual Christmas entertainments for the children have been, and are being held, to the great delight of many a little heart. The fabled Santa Claus has made his annual call and dumped his many gifts to gladden multitudes of little hearts all over the land and then departed not to return for another year.

Many and marked have been the changes occurring in various neighborhoods. This, like yours, has lost some of its most valuable citizens, losses that no community can well afford, because they cannot be replaced. There are men in every neighborhood whose lives seem indispensable, because they are the leaders of public thought and every enterprise and improvement, which have for their object the well being of society in general. Mysterious, however, as it may appear, these are often the very first to go, indicating that the hands which hold the reins of the chariot of Providence are guided by infinite wisdom. These dispensations should impress us with the facts so familiar and yet so liable to be forgotten that "Here have we no continuing city," or the brevity, or uncertainty of human life and the transitory character of material things. Man's being is a miracle. Human life is a great problem, the solution of which begins in time, but can be fully completed only in eternity. "How long men live, not years, but deeds must tell, and deeds, good or bad, like wavelets extend their ever widening circles beyond the limits of time out on the ocean of eternity, for deeds form character, and character will live forever and fix destiny." It is said of Vespasian, the Roman emperor, that throughout his life, use to call himself to account every night for his actions of the past day; as often as he found he had passed any one day without doing some good he entered in his diary this memorandum: "Diem perdidi"—"I have lost a day." Would it not be well for all your readers to imitate the example of Vespasian and see whether we have lost any time or opportunity of accomplishing some good for the benefit of our fellowmen, so that our lives shall be as index fingers pointing all others to a better and happier life. Multitudes of people are like waifs floating upon the tide, carried about by every wind of circumstances. Multitudes of others, like the tree spoken of in the Scriptures, that brought forth nothing but leaves, living fruitless lives.

That you and all your readers may have a happy, useful and prosperous year is the sincere wish of yours truly, DEL.

Newport.

AN EXTINCT RACE.

They are Said to be Thickly Buried in the Soil of Connecticut.

Connecticut seems to have been one vast burying ground, either of Indians or some race long since extinct. In the city of Bridgeport the skulls of several Indian women have been unearthed by workmen who were digging for sewers or house foundations. At Seaside Park are a number of Indian graves in which have been found pipes, beads, arrow heads, drills, knives and various trinkets so dear to the heart of nature's untutored child. In places it is almost impossible to dig a hole or trench without coming in contact with human bones. In the town of Stratford curious pieces of pottery, rudely ornamented, gorgeous trinkets and other similar articles are taken from the earth. All these different articles indicate from their diversity that the tribes in several districts were quite alike in their habits and modes of ornamentation. In the vicinity of Fairfield some curious tools and ornaments have been found in the graves of people who once hunted and fished in the forests and streams of New England. In all of these sepulchral mounds are large quantities of clam and oyster shells. There is something peculiar to the soil which preserves the bones intact and without decay. Even the hair of most of the bodies remains long, black and glossy. At Sandy Hook are three large mounds, which are said to be filled with the relics of savages who once made Western Connecticut their hunting and fishing ground. The mounds are from six to ten feet high. On account of superstition the land owners will not allow the resting place of the extinct race to be disturbed.

HOW TO CLOSE A WATCH.—One of the group pulled out a handsome gold watch, evidently new, looked at its face and closed the case noiselessly.

"Never do that," said the man next to him. "You make the same error that most people do with watches. That is a new watch you have there, and you are careful of it. Let me have it a moment and I will show you something."

The watch was handed to him.

"In closing a hunting-case watch," continued the second speaker, opening the one in his hand, "never push the spring back so that the case will shut without a click. Shut it right down on the spring, like that and your case will not wear out in half the time that it will if you try to save it by pushing the little steel spring out of the way of its gold notch."

"How do you know all this?" asked the owner of the watch.

"I've been a watch salesman for many moons and know whereof I speak," was the reply.

A CHOIR REBUKED.—Sunday morning last Rev. William H. Hubbard, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Auburn, N. Y., adopted a stinging and effective method of dealing with an offending choir. He publicly rebuked the members of the choir for laughing and otherwise misbehaving themselves while the service was in progress, and when they continued with their frivolity he suddenly paused in the midst of his sermon, glanced toward the choir gallery, where the singers were amusing themselves, and abruptly dismissed the congregation. It is a wealthy congregation, and the incident has caused a sensation in church circles.
