After being in service for almost 100 years, the old pumping station on the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, at Chespeake City, Md., will soon be scrapped. The pump was used to draw water from the Chesapeake bay into the canal to keep the thoroughfare at an even level. With the advent of the sea level canal, the station will be discarded, since the level of the canal will henceforth be regulated by the tides. The pumping station has a capacity of about 100,000 gallons a day. Col. Earl I. Brown stated the pumping station is of no use to the government, but may be used by farmers, who have large tracts of lands, for irrigation purposes.
