One Slam After Another

This door, attached to an ingenious machine, has been opened and slammed shut 100,000 times to test the quality of materials and workmanship used in Studebaker doors. At regular intervals Studebaker engineers take a body from the production line and subject it to this withering treatment. If it stands up under the punishment they know that it will give many more miles of service than will ever be required. If it doesn't, the cause of the failure is determined and corrected. This test supplies a wealth of information on such parts as locks, window glass, door handles and hinges. It is but one of hundreds which enable Studebaker engineers to build cars that perpetuate Studebaker's 78-year reputation for long life.
