Words are the transcript of those ideas which are in the mind of man, and writing or printing is the transcript of words.—Addison.

We cordially invite all who have no church connections to attend these services. George F. Horn, successor to Theo. D. Martens, is the pastor of the Lutheran Mission.

It isn't the heat as much as it is the fumility.

Nothing makes a man feel hotter than to realize that his credit is frozen.

HE WAS NOT AN OLD LOAFER

"You don't mean Tom Sackett from over Bayview way?" queried Rodney scornfully, and more scornfully—"That loafer!"

Alice Harlowe flushed with indignation and embarrassment. In the first place, a younger brother, not quite twenty, had no right to discuss his sister's friends in such manner.

"I don't see why you call him a loafer," said Alice trying hard to make it seem to her brother that she really didn't care whether he were a loafer or not. "Besides, being a loafer is no reason he shouldn't take me to the country club dance. He's a marvelous dancer."

"Yeah!" said Rodney with some excitement. "Well, being a loafer who never has done a lick of work in his life does make a man undesirable as a brother-in-law. You know perfectly well that since Tom Sackett has been coming over here none of the other chaps come round any more."

"Silly," said Alice, with big-sisterly patronage. "But what makes you say Tom Sackett is a loafer? If he doesn't have any business it is doubtless because he has a lot of money. He's a keen golfer, reads everything worth while and knows everything anyone needs to know about farm management."

"All I know is that he hasn't a cent to his name. He borrowed money to get through college, and instead of going ahead with some sort of profession or business he's just dumped himself down here on his rich old aunt who supports him in luxury, while he goes around acting like a millionaire's son or an earl or something."

"It seems to me you know quite a lot about Tom Sackett," snapped Alice, "but, really, I'm not the least bit interested."

But Alice really was concerned. And since she had no plans for the remainder of the day that could not be postponed, when Rodney left her to go back to his books she found an excuse to take possession of the family car for the afternoon and started forthwith on an amateur detective expedition.

She stopped to call on the middle-aged spinsters whose house stood across the highway from the Sackett estate. She knew that no great love was lost between these sedate ladies and their more opulent neighbor.

As she sat for a while with them she deftly led the conversation to the Sacketts.

"Strange that a man like Tom Sackett," said she, "should be willing to live on his aunt's bounty."

"Just waiting around till he lands his heiress," sniffed one of the hostesses. "Well, whoever gets him is welcome to him."

"I imagine he's pleasant enough," said the other sister in an effort to soften a hard speech, "but he does seem to be a dreadful loafer."

As soon as she could politely do so Alice left and went on to the rectory, and from the rather gossipy young clergyman and his wife gathered a little more opinion of the same general tenor. Later she hailed one of her brother's friends walking along the highway and asked to give him a lift.

"Rodney was telling me about Tom Sackett," she began. "Imagine being willing to give up all ideas of work just because your aunt had money."

"Yeah," quoth the young man. "Tom's a nice chap. Don't know as I blame him. Think I'd do the same if I had a chance. That's a swell place his aunt has." And that was all the satisfaction that Alice got from that source.

As she drove up the roadway that led to her own comfortable home Alice spied Tom Sackett sitting in his own—or his aunt's—roadster at one side of the driveway, apparently waiting for her return. He jumped from the car and swung to the running board of hers. Alice was coolly polite. But the look of disappointment in Tom's handsome face made her swiftly regret the attitude she knew he had guessed so rightly.

He led her to a secluded spot in her own garden and there asked her to marry him. But before she could accept or refuse or put him off, he explained his position.

"I borrowed money to finish college," he said; "—borrowed it from outside because my aunt wouldn't lend it—she would have insisted on giving it. Then when I was through my aunt made a fair proposition. She offered me a position to come and work for her for a year—to manage her estate, and the rest of the time to do just what she wanted me to. In return I was to have my keep and a certain salary. Well, I accepted, because I knew she needed me and I needed the money. After I have paid back what I borrowed I shall have a thousand dollars left, which is just the capital I need to start in on that irrigation plan my roommate and I had doped out. So you see—"

"You are certainly not a loafer—" said Alice. "And I think I would have said 'yes' even though you were."

Schools for Bridesmaids

"Schools" for training the brides, bridegrooms and bridesmaids who are to figure in fashionable weddings are to be found in London. Every movement is taught, from handling the bride's train to which of the bridegroom's arms she takes after the ceremony.—London Tit-Bits.

The Philosopher

"Yes," he said, "I think the world is getting better."

"And may I ask why?" she answered.

For a moment he twisted the ring she had just handed back to him, held it in such a position as to make it flash brightly.

Then he replied:

"This is the first time I have ever had an engagement ring returned without a fight or protest."

Flowers in Japan

The arrangement of flowers is traditionally an art in Japan, and even developed into a philosophy in the Fifteenth century. The basic idea is to reproduce in the arrangement the effect of growing plants, and also to reflect the season or the occasion. Certain colors are considered especially suitable for certain occasions. An uneven number of flowers in a display is considered lucky and more true to nature than an even number.

Light Stops Trains

Demonstration of a method of halting trains by the action of a beam of light, was made with a small model recently. A small hand lamp casts a ray which strikes a light cell on the front of the engine. The cell then causes the brakes of the train to be applied through the action of relays set in operation by the effect of the light upon the cell.

Jimmy—Pa, will you give me a good spanking right now?

Pa—Why, Jimmy?

Jimmy—Because I'm going swimming, and I don't want to be thinking about it while I'm there.

Anti-Crime Officers Laud Coast-to-Coast Teletype

Use of the teletypewriter system is a great asset to the New York City Police Department. Commissioner Edward P. Mulrooney is shown here dictating a message to two of the operators.

A coast-to-coast police teletypewriter hook-up recently demonstrated at Seattle, Oregon, in the presence of hundreds of judges, government attorneys, sheriffs and police officials attending the international anti-crime conference proved most successful. The demonstration was planned by convention officials to prove the ease with which police, thousands of miles apart, could instantly spread news vital in tracking criminals. Within three minutes after an important crime has been reported, a summary of 120 words can be placed in the hands of police in scores of cities.

The teletypewriter hook-up included fifteen cities in twelve states and a Canadian Province scattered across the continent from the Pacific Coast to New York. An exchange of greetings was made by Governor Meier, of Oregon, and Major Wilhelm, of the Pennsylvania State Police. President Luke S. May, of the Northwest Association of Sheriffs and Police, presided at the demonstration.

In his teletypewriter message to the other states, President May declared in part: "Modern methods of travel have made it imperative that methods of communication between law enforcement departments be quickened, and it is an absolute necessity under our complex system of police procedure that there be developed a close spirit of co-operation." His message was transmitted to police heads in each of the fifteen different cities, and they in turn made brief replies which were read to the convention. The convention operator then typed out a message to all cities simultaneously, stating that the network was then open for the balance of the convention for the transmission of police information and other police matters. The cities included in the network were New York, Harrisburg, Pa., Columbus and Toledo, O., Springfield, Ill., Denver, Seattle, Spokane, Vancouver, Salem, Portland, San Diego, Los Angeles, Sacramento and San Francisco on the Pacific Coast.
