"I have suffered everything possible with sore eyes and headache, the sores so severe that I was blind. CHESTER ALLIANCE.

Address Delivered by President JOHN BELL at the Last Meeting.

Brother Alliance members: It is with pleasure that I greet you this first meeting of the year 1895; 1894 has gone, and with it we all felt severely the hard times it made for the farmers. It was certainly one of the hardest years we ever experienced; almost everything we undertook was a failure, with extremely low prices prevailing throughout the entire year. But after all we have some things to be thankful for, when we remember the condition of our brother farmers in west and northwest. We escaped their forest fires and cyclones, and while our drought was very severe it was by no means as severe as theirs, so, brothers, we must not despond; we must strike our flint again and resolve to do better this year.

We must try to make two blades of grass grow where but one grew before; also the same with wheat and corn, potatoes and all other crops we undertake to grow. I would recommend and advise not to undertake more than we can manage properly, and one of the most important, if not the most important is economy—economy in our farm labor, in the feeding of our stock the care and use of implements, and our personal and family expenses, we should also see that our public expenses are kept down to the lowest possible figure.

Now in carrying out these ideas we should endeavor to buy as little as possible and grow many things that we now buy, such as orchard grass seed, clover seed, timothy seed; and I would also advise the planting of an acre or two of broom corn, and the manufacture of our own brooms. I would not recommend the planting of more orchards at the present time but to give better attention to those we have now; have them properly pruned by taking out all the old dead wood, cultivate the soil thoroughly, and where the soil is thin manure or fertilize liberally, for one basket of large peaches is worth as much as six baskets of culls.

We should also give more attention to stock raising. It would pay I think to keep all our heifer calves from the best cows and then in two or three years we would have cows to sell, instead of to buy, and by keeping a thorough bred bull of whatever breed you prefer you will greatly improve your stock at the same time.

It is true the horse market is dull, the craze for breeding stallions that swept over the country a few years ago drew into the business hundreds that should have employed their talents in some other line, not one in a hundred of whom produced an animal above the ordinary, and electricity and the bicycle have so surperseded horses as a motive power that there is practically no market for ordinary horses; but there is a demand in our cities at the present time for the heavy draft horse for labor and the high class driving horse and the saddle horse that shall please the fastidious man of wealth. Therefore, in breeding we should breed for one of these purposes, and as the most of us have one or more good mares we can succeed. I think, in procuring a profitable horse if we will only breed to a stallion of the right blood. To show that such horses will pay I would cite the fact that at the late horse show in Baltimore there were two Kentucky riding horses sold, one for $1,000 and the other for $5,000, and at the last horse show in New York there was a pair of half bred Hackneys, well matched, handsome, and broken to drive and act like one horse, that sold for $2,400: and I think we can produce such horses as these by breeding a good grade mare to a thoroughbred Cleveland Bay or Hackney, and then give the colt good attention, both in rearing and the breaking or training; and brothers, I still think that with proper care and attention there is yet some profit in sheep, and hogs, and also with poultry, with proper attention. See that they have good warm quarters, have them mated with thoroughbred roosters of whatever breed you may prefer, and then properly fed. I have no doubt but that they will pay handsomely and help us out in our effort to have something to sell almost every week in the year. Now, brothers, I have tried to give you a few ideas to think and talk about at our meetings, and will conclude by expressing the wish that these hard times may pass away and that each and every one of us may have a prosperous year.

A Mysterious Communication.

The following letter was received by the News editors this week. We showed it to a phosphate agent but he said it was not him. He knew of the lady and of one of the gentlemen, but did not know J. C. We hope our readers will do all in their power to help the young lady get a man, if she needs any help. The letter reads as follows:

PHILADA, Jan. 23, 1895.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Wonders never cease. Setting lonely in my room, thinking of the Good old times I have had in Kent, and going as far back as the summer of 1892. I met a young lady of Philadelphia who was visiting Chestertown at the time mentioned above, and she is quite a frequent visitor of your town, is one of the most popular cashiers of one of the largest dry goods stores of Philadelphia, which is John Wannamaker's. I have understood since she was engaged to one of your lime and phosphate agents of Chestertown and now understand the engagement has been broken by the lady herself. If this be so today I am a happy man. She ought to get a (man) when she gets married. Don't care if this is answered.

I remain, J. C.,
of Phila., a visitor of your town.

THE CHESIRE PIG.—Mr. B. B. Brumbaugh and several other Tuckahoe Neck farmers now have this favorite stock of hogs, which originated in Jefferson county, N. Y., by a cross of stock imported from Chesire, England, with the finest native stock. The Chesire resembles the Berkshire, but is much larger, and white instead of black. They are noted for their large amount of lean meat, and the meat has a very fine grain and is very solid. They are immensely popular wherever introduced, and are pre-eminently the farmer's hog, because of their rapid growth, early maturity and size when kept over a year.—Denton Journal.

PREPARING TO MARRY?—One of our young gentlemen of general popularity has joined the following organizations: The Church, Epworth League, Christain Endeavor, the club, the Odd-Fellows, the Masons, Law and Order League and many other orders. He has thus an engagement for every night in the week. Is this young man eligible to matrimony? We asked one of our best citizens this question and his reply was this: "Well, that fellow is what I would call a "Jiner" and I would advise him to "Jine" himself to some nice young lady and they could arrange about the other engagements."

NEWS AT THE COLLEGE.

Another View of the Late Fight for President of Mount Vernon.

MESSRS. EDITORS KENT NEWS:

It was with amazement that many of the students on the hill read in your last issue of the death of the Mount Vernon Literary Society. It had rather seemed to them that the society had awakened from its slumbers and started upon a more useful career, and that the "strangers" had thrown themselves into the society's work in manner that showed them to be trained workers and only strangers in Chestertown. It seems that the writer of "One View of it" had lost sight of all else in the desire for office. The spirited struggle that held the society for over two hours on a single vote was not brought on by a struggle for office alone but the determination of the president to conduct the affairs of the society according to its laws. The gentlemen who came a second time to the society, with their supporters brought in for their votes alone, faced another president than the one whom they threatened to throw out the window.

The subdued hum of voices, the hurrying about and consultations of the leaders before the society was called to order, was an indication of the struggle that broke forth immediately after the minutes were read.

In accordance with an amendment that says, "Any member who absents himself for four consecutive meetings without a reasonable excuse shall be an associate member," the "Venables" contingent challenged six of their own and fourteen (including three honorary members) of the Simpers' force. Then Messrs. Usilton and Baxter were ruled from the floor under the section of the constitution that forbids any honorary member to speak without the consent of a majority of the society; upon Mr. Usilton asking for the consent of the society a ballot was begun which lasted two hours and a quarter on account of constant interruptions from both sides.

Mr. Perkins, leader of Simpers' forces, demanded that his men be allowed to give excuse for absences, some of which had extended over the whole year. He claimed that under the fourth order in the order of business in the by-laws, which says absentees of the previous meeting shall give their excuses, that excuses ought to be received not only from those who had not been present at any meeting this term but those who had been present since their absence and failed to offer an excuse. The president ruled that the order of business in the constitution, which made no mention of excuses took precedence of the order in the by-laws. After wrangling for a while the Venables' leaders conceded the privilege of a call for excuses for the preceeding meeting under the by-laws. The president then announced that the roll would be called for excuses, but was interrupted by Mr. Perkins demanding the right to offer all excuses. This occurred several times, Mr. Perkins always obstructing the call. At last all were weary of the protracted struggle, the Simpers men left the hall claiming that they could not obtain justice, and thus ended the struggle.

They had refused to allow the president to proceed according to by-laws even. They would appeal from his decision but only clamored for something that could not be given by the widest stretch of the by-laws.

They should have realized that law is not always what we wish it, or that a person's desire can change the fundamental principles of our rule. It is only when the last resort is made use of in vain and men are persistently and wrongfully oppressed that they are justified in extreme measures or revolt.

We will only assure all that the Mount Vernon lives and lives in a way that presages no early death. The members are doing their full duty and seem to have had new life infused into them by the struggle that brought forth all their faculties. Though twenty-five members have left us thus reducing the society, it is the same Mount Vernon whose past has been so glorious and whose future will not be hidden in the brightness we have left behind us.

"Colonial History."

Among the very earliest colonists who gave their personal services, their fortunes, and their influence in founding this province of Maryland, were Thomas Hynson, Simon Wilmer, Michael Miller, William Harris, Marmaduke Tylden, Thomas Lewis, John Carvill and others.

Thomas Hynson was among those who settled upon the "Isle of Kent" naming their new home in the American Wilderness after their old English one. They also gave many of the tracts of land they took up familiar names belonging to the mother country.

Thomas Hynson (or Hinson), the original settler in Maryland, reached this province on or about the twenty-third of June, 1651, as on that day he made demand upon the Lord proprietor's government for the share of land due him for transporting into the province himself, wife, three children and eight servants.

He was twenty nine year-old and must have shown nobility, as in 1652 he was made "High Sheriff" of the county.

Court proceedings were held at his house for several years. This office of "High Sheriff," we are told, was most honorable and vested with great authority. He was constantly elected to positions of trust, as the public records show. He was "Commissioners," "Lieutenant," "Member of the Court," "Member (or Representative) in the House of Burgesses" and continued in office until his death at the early age of forty-nine.

His mantle of usefulness and honor fell upon his sons, as in succession for generations they were in places of public trust and influence. The settlement of Kent Island was the very first in this colony. Most of the settlers were Protestants and belonged to the church of England. Many were men of education and wealth calling themselves planters.

More prominence has incidentally been given to some of these early colonists than to others, who bore an equal share in laying the foundation of our growth into national existence.

The transition to these western wilds must have been a terrible experience for these families of early settlers who had left homes of luxury in old England. We can trace many to their birth places and marvel at their courage and the adventurous spirit which impelled them to cross the wide Atlantic and became pioneers in the New World.

Their names and efforts should never be forgotten as they suffered much to establish an inheritance on these shores for their children to perpetuate and enjoy.

These forefathers on Kent Island were christian men. They enacted moral and religious laws and enforced them.

They erected houses for public worship and the sons of the first colonists were the founders and supporters of St. Paul's P. E. church in Kent county, one of the best preserved and oldest brick churches in Maryland. H. L. W. H.
