If the reports of the coming in from the various peach sections are correct, the peach crop in Southern Pennsylvania will be almost a total failure. The blizzard of February is responsible for the condition of the peach crop. At Edgemont and vicinity, where there are thousands of trees, growers say they will have no fruit for shipment or sale. The same condition exist at Edenville, Franklin county, and also at Huntsdale, which has been considered one of the leading peach centers in this country.

Experiments With Wheat.—In the tests of the different varieties of wheat at the Maryland Agriculture Experiment Station new ones were added from time to time and the unpromising ones discarded so that comparatively few were grown continuously for any number of years, and of the 20 varieties which were under test for over six years 14 gave average yields of over 30 bushels per acre, the "Fultz" leading with an average of 35.1 bushels per acre. While there are a good number of varieties of wheat and no doubt that some will be adapted in particular soils and locations better than the Fultz, yet some of them is likely to meet the requirements over as great a range of territory and for as long as it has done. Where this species has once done well and now fails to give satisfactory yields it will generally be found to be due to a deterioration of the seed, either from lack of care in selection or from becoming very much mixed with other varieties. Experiments have shown that getting seed wheat from different localities did not give increased yields but rather with care in the selection of the seed that the yield improved with becoming acclimated. It may be learned from the work done at the Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station that it is perfectly possible with proper cultivation on lands adapted to growing wheat to make averages yield 30 or more bushels per acre, and seldom if ever to fall below 25 bushels. Unless a yield of at least 30 bushels per acre can be obtained it is doubtful if a farmer is ever justified in growing a crop of wheat, for at present prices it will cost more than it returns. It has been found by experiment that even the idea of growing wheat as a necessary step to setting the land in grass or to obtain the straw for bedding is not a justifiable excuse, as grass can be set better when by itself and bedding can be gotten in greater abundance, cheaper and of a better quality by raising corn and shredding the fodder. Many varieties of white smooth wheat, white bearded wheats, amber smooth wheats, red smooth wheats and red bearded wheats have been tested at the Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station between the years 1889 and 1899.

Points About the Kissing Bug.

Prof. Chope, of the Field museum, describes the real kissing-bug as "a formidable looking bug, one of the most terrorizing we have. First let me say that he is not an insect and should never be so described. There is a sharp line between insects and bugs. The former never grow after they are hatched, while the latter start as mere atoms and have a vigorous growth. Now, the 'kissing-bug' resembles the bug commonly called the squash bug.' He is, however, longer, narrower and darker. He is about three-eighths of an inch in length and about an eighth of an inch wide. On each side of his body are three legs, long and spindling, which he moves fast and with great agility. His back and sides are smoother than those of the 'squash bug' and of a dull brown color, with few markings, if I remember correctly. His beak is his fortune. It is long, sharp and mobile, not forked, as it has been described, but with a single, lancet-like prong. On each side of his head are antennae, which are extremely sensitive and always moving. His armor is harder than that of the 'squash bug.'"

THAT by putting off till tomorrow what we don't want to do to-day we gain a chance of seeing some one else do it for us.
