Career of A Modern Desperado.

The astonishing achievements of the fugitive Tracey, which have attracted the attention of the whole country, can end only in his capture and punishment. It is not likely that he will find any place of refuge in this broad land, or even in the wilds of Canada, where the long arms of the law will not finally reach him. The days when men could take to the woods and rob and murder for a living have passed, and the telegraph makes escape for a fugitive well nigh impossible. Nevertheless, the murderous career of this man since he escaped from the Oregon State Penitentiary at Salem on June 9 has been one of maryelous achievement, of quick resource in danger, of cruel disregard of human life and of every obligation of a civilized man. Of his courage he has given abundant evidence. Courage is always admired, and his possession of this quality has interested people in him and brought to him a certain kind of sympathy to which he is in no wise entitled. He is the kind of man whom the officers of the law are justified in shooting down at sight for the protection of society, just as a mad dog is shot down. The applause of a number of persons who witnessed one of his wonderful escapes from capture in his present flight was a manifestation of the spirit which creates heroes out of Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin. That Tracey had provided himself with red pepper to cover his trail when he was pursued by bloodhounds is evidence of his forethought and that he possesses other qualities of mind besides mere animal courage.

The outlaw, it is said, some 10 years ago was a barber in the village of Still Pond, in Kent County, Maryland. He left there after stealing everything he could lay his hands on, taking nothing of any account, however, and made his way to the Far West. Here he engaged in a career of crime, and was finally brought to the bar and sentenced to the Oregon Penitentiary for committing a series of robberies and burglaries. More than a month ago—on June 9—he, along with a fellow-convict named David Merrill, killed three of their guards, mortally wounded a fellow-prisoner and succeeded in making his escape. Merrill has disappeared, and Tracey says he killed him in a "duel" after their flight began. In this flight Tracey has made a series of hairbreadth escapes, killed five men besides the three murdered at the penitentiary, eluded hundreds of officials and broken through the lines of those by whom he was surrounded, thrown bloodhounds off his scent, seized boats and compelled the owners to convey him where he wished to go, taken possession of farmhouses and compelled the inmates to wait upon him, provide food for his journey and help him on his way. Last Wednesday he went into the house of a farmer named Johnson not far from Seattle, took possession and compelled Johnson to go to town, borrow money and buy a revolver and ammunition for him. After getting the pistol he took Johnson's horse and rode off with provisions for a week. Upon more than one occasion he seized horses and vehicles to carry him on his journey. One of the boats which the outlaw seized was a naphtha launch, with a crew of six men, whom he overawed and compelled to do his bidding. One of his exploits at one of the farmhouses he visited was to compel a farm hand to accompany him on his way to carry his supplies. This man, when there was no further use for him, was left bound and gagged in the woods. The facility with which he bends men to his purpose is somewhat surprising, but the explanation is that it is known that the man is desperate, and, with his rifle pointed at them, it is a choice between compliance and instant death. Under these circumstances the average mam will comply.

Tracey's flight of 34 days has carried him across the State of Oregon, well-nigh across Washington on his way to Canada. After reaching Canada it is hard to see that his chances of final escape will be improved.—Sun.
