SAYS MEAT "OSLERIZES"

Tells Of Mistakes In Diet — Old-Fashioned Mush And Hominy More Wholesome And Cheaper Than Modern Preparations.

"When you go to a grocery and buy beefsteak or milk you're paying for water, for the elements of water are predominant in all our foods. Milk is 80 per cent. water and beefsteak is 60 per cent. water." Dr. W. H. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture, whose experiments with a "poison squad" have attracted wide attention, made this statement in a lecture at the Woman's College Tuesday afternoon on "Foods—Their Composition and Function."

And speaking of milk, he wasn't referring to the overridden joke on its experiences under the pump. Milk is 80 per cent. water when it's milk; what it is when it has been watered only those who have drunk "cambric tea" as children can know.

Americans Eat Too Much Meat.

Dr. Wiley told his hearers a great many things which do not agree with the average American's idea of eating. He said:

Americans eat too much meat. When you've got a great deal of work to do don t eat a lot of meat. Eat fatty and starchy foods, plenty of potatoes, corn and bread. They build up tissues and don't overwork the kidneys. Beefsteak and other nitrogenous foods overwork the body in expelling them.

"When I was a boy I was taught, too, that the way to make a man so that he wanted to fight was to feed him a lot of meat. The present war between Russia and Japan is showing that the man who eats least meat—tor the Japanese live largely upon rice—can do the best fighting. They are not overworking their bodies in the digestion of food. Their diet makes the Japanese shorter and harder to hit and they don't have so much to carry around with them. If I had charge of the football squad of my university—Harvard—I would see that they ate very little meat during their training period, and I'd see if we couldn't win a game from Yale."

Eating Too Fast

Dr. Wiley says that eating too fast is another evil of American life, and (what sounds more strange) that the reason for this is not so much that we fail to properly masticate our food under such conditions, as because when we eat fast we eat more than we should. An average man requires 3,000 calories of food a day. If we could measure the amount of food we ate before each meal we would be more healthy than we are, but nature, taking care of this, has placed our appetite as the register of what is good for us. When we eat fast the balance the appetite should strike is lost, and we eat more than we want.

Less Food Needed In Spring.

"When spring comes on," said Dr. Wiley, "remember that your body does not require as much food as it did during the winter and moderate your appetite accordingly.

"Hay fever is nothing more or less than the result of overeating."

There was a general laugh and Dr. Wiley corrected himself.

"Spring fever, I should have said," he laughed. "It is a languor which comes from overloading the stomach during the time when the body doesn't have to fight the rigors of winter, when there is too much waste matter in it.

"And don't drink distilled water, Drink water as it comes out of the earth, with all its mineral foods, magnesia, etc.

"Don't eat a great deal while you are working; eat after the work has been done," said Dr. Wiley. "You are always drawing your strength from the food you have taken the day before. For instance, the laboring man should make supper his heartiest meal, so that he would not be bothered by the labor of throwing off the waste from a heavy meal while he is working."

The Doctor's Own Way.

Dr. Wiley was asked by a reporter of THE SUN in an interview after the lecture for a diet for the different meals of the day.

"After what I have said there is a little to add," he replied. "For myself, I usually eat a couple of eggs, a potato, perhaps, and bread and coffee for breakfast. Luncheon I seldom take more than a bowl of soup, a roll and a glass of milk. I eat a hearty meal at dinner time and seldom do night work."

In reply to a question, Dr. Willey said that the popular idea that the stomach is not in condition to receive a hearty meal at breakfast after its 10 or 12 hour fast is erroneous. "It should then be in condition to do its best work," he said, "but one should not eat a hearty breakfast, because work usually follows breakfast."

"Should a woman's diet be different from that of a man? Well, I shouldn't say so. You know I regard woman as a human [the Profess r's eye twinkled], and I don't see why she shouldn't eat what man does."

Old Time Dishes Wholesome.

"Do you believe in the modern breakfast foods which are being eaten so extensively?" the chemists was asked.

His eyes twinkled.

"What's the use of paying so much for a fancy name?" he asked. "What's the matter with old fashioned mush, hominy and all the other old fashioned things, all of which are extremely wholesome and much cheaper? I don't eat the modern breakfast food myself."

"But they are predigested."

"You don't want that. Often the food which requires the greatest amount of time to digest does you the greater amount of good."

TEN THOUSAND converts to the Christian faith have, it is asserted, been recorded since the wave of religious enthusiasm which is sweeping over Philadelphia first made its presence manifest. In every church and every denomination the effect of the revival of sentiment is apparent, and the work has not yet been systematized or so directed as to make its real force felt. It has up to this time been progressing entirely without direction, except a direction has been given by individual congregations and churches to their own services.
