TOILET OF THE DIVER

OPERATION OF PUTTING ON AND TAKING OFF HIS COSTUME.

One of the Requisites of the Diver's Dressing Platform Is an Old Tin Can—A Lesson In the Art of Taking Things Easy—Necessity For Care.

To watch a diver while he is dressing or divesting himself of his professional apparel is not only to be taught a lesson in the art of taking things easily, but also impresses one with the fact that the diver's is the only occupation under the sun in which a tin can is a toilet requisite.

The can in question is not an ornamental object, such as a silver backed hairbrush is or a set of manicure instruments, but the diver's valet needs it in his business as much as any fop needs either of the silver implements, for it is in this battered old tin that the valet drops the thumbscrews that keep the rubber cloth of the diving suit confined in place between the outer and inner plates of the cuirass-like shell the diver wears over his shoulders and across his breast. There they remain until the diver is ready to dress again, when the valet carefully picks them out of the tin and screws them back in place.

The operation of dressing a diver requires two distinct movements, one taking place on the deck of the vessel or platform from which he is working, the other at the head of the ladder on which the diver descends to the depths below. It is a business that requires a good deal of time, for the diver's life depends on just how carefully each of the several things are done, and no one sacrifices thoroughness to speed.

The diver always has a comfortable place to sit on before he begins removing his shoes, after which he draws on a long pair of heavy woolen stockings over the legs of trousers. Over these again he pulls on another pair of trousers, and then he draws on the lower part of his diving suit proper. After that is done he is in the hands of his valet, who is also the man who tends the air pipe and signal rope after the diver has descended to the bottom of the sea.

One of the curiosities of this operation is the immobility of the man who is being dressed. He sits perfectly still with his hands clasped between his knees, rarely speaking, his eyes fixed on some distant point as though he were absorbed in considering some weighty problem.

Meanwhile the valet has been drawing the rubber suit up on the diver's arms and part way up over his chest, and then he slips down over his head the steel cuirass that keeps the pressure of the water away from his chest and also serves to support the weight of the copper helmet on his shoulders.

At this point in the operation the tin can comes into use, and the valet takes from it the brass thumbscrews that confine the upper edges of the diving suit between the cuirass and the four steel bands that are fastened outside of it. Then the valet puts a black silk skullcap on the diver's head, and the diver waddles over to the head of the ladder after a pair of heavy rubber bands are slipped over the rubber cuffs of the suit, for the diver works with bared hands.

Then come the final touches of the costume, which are always made as near the head of the ladder as possible, for these operations consist of putting on the weighted shoes, the weighted breast belt and the copper helmet. The diver slips his feet into the shoes of cast iron, and his valet and another helper buckle them around his instep. Then he bends down, resting his arms on the head of the ladder, while the belt, on which are fastened great, thick squares of lead, is buckled around his breast and across his shoulders.

The signal cord is fastened to the breastplate with leather thongs, and then the signal is given to the man at the air pump to "work lively," which means that he is to send the wheel around at a much faster pace than he does when the diver is at work, this being done to get a good current of air passing through the pipe. Least time of all does it take to put the helmet on, for it is dropped into place, and after one half turn the thing is done.

Down goes the grotesque figure below the surface of the water, up from the helmet comes a constant stream of air bubbles, and if the diver is not working at too great a depth you can presently hear the click of his tools ringing away at work.—New York Press.

Emerson's Prayer.

Whittier and Emerson were taking a drive together when they passed a small, unpainted house by the roadside.

"There," said Emerson, pointing out the house, "lives an old Calvinist, and she prays for me every day. I am glad she does, I pray for myself."

"Does she?" said Whittier. "What does thee pray for, friend Emerson?"

"Well," replied Emerson, "when I first open my eyes upon the beautiful world I thank God that I am alive and live so near Boston."

Unprofessional.

"You say she's only an amateur nurse?"

"Yes. If she had been a professional nurse she wouldn't have married the first patient that came along. She'd have looked around a little first."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.
