Two Tramps

By BELLE MANIATES

Copyright, 1906, by W. R. Caldwell

"Let's play tramp, Aunt Lou."

"All right, Bob. Wait until I change my slippers for shoes and find my oldest skirt."

Bob waited impatiently, shouting "Hurry up!" at intervals. Presently his blithe young aunt came forth, equipped for the jaunt.

"Tramps never change their clothes," growled Bob, the ten-year-old despot.

"I wouldn't if I were really a tramp all the time," she argued, "but, you see, where I am compelled to lead a Jekyll and Hyde existence I have to dress for my part—my two parts. Where do you suggest an expedition to this time?"

"Through the woods by the river," he replied promptly.

"Tramps generally favor river roads. Shall we catch fish for our supper?"

"No," he objected strenuously; "tramps never work. I found a dime last time, you know, and bought bread and honey at the grocery. Now it's your turn to provide the eats."

"You had such luck," she replied in an envious tone. "I'll have to beg or

"DUCK NOW AND KEEP STILL!"

steal. I never find anything. We'll not go hungry. Let me see, have you any matches?"

"Of course. Tramps always have matches."

"Do they? Well, let's take this road up past the Hill farm."

"Oh, I bet I know what you are going to do. You are going through Hill's cornfield and swipe some ears of corn, and then you are going to build a fire in the woods and roast corn!"

"A veritable Sherlock Holmes!" she quoth admiringly. "But I am not going to swipe it. When one goes into a field like that it is only foraging."

"I wish we had some salt and some butter," said Bob longingly.

"You're above your station," she reforted. "The idea of a tramp wanting luxuries!"

In the cornfield they secured half a dozen ears of ripe corn, and then sought the woods.

"It's my turn to cook, Bob," asserted his young aunt, beginning to collect twigs, brush and dried leaves.

"All right! You build the fire, and I'm going down to the river."

"Leave me the matches, and don't stay long."

There was method in Bob's departure. He still had longings for salt and butter, and he knew there were apt to be picnic parties on the river bank. When he returned, a fire was burning cheerily, and the corn was in the oven.

"Look here, Aunt Lou!" he cried gleefully, displaying salt, a little pat of butter, two chicken sandwiches, two pickles and a quarter section of banana cake.

"Oh, Bob! A regular feast we will have. You're a mascot always. Did you beg of some of the picnickers?"

"No," he replied. "I found lunch baskets on the shore and no one near; at least I didn't see any one. I just helped myself. If I had been a real tramp I would have swiped the whole layout."

"Oh, Bob!" she said ruefully. "You shouldn't have gone into their baskets. That wasn't right."

"Well, I like that! Will you please tell me who stole this corn?"

"That's quite different. We know Farmer Hill."

"Worse yet, to steal from your friends."

"Nonsense, Bob! You know we can tell him, and he has corn"—

"To burn!" laughed Bob, carefully spreading out his spoils on the ground. "But these strangers"—

"Well, they've got plenty and"—

He stopped short, listened, and then seized the hand of his companion, running her to a pile of wood corded up by some chopper.

"Duck now and keep still!"

"What was it?" she whispered breathlessly.

"I heard some one coming through the woods. Maybe they're after their stuff."

After a long interval of silence Bob took observations. Seeing no one, he cautiously and by detour sought the precincts of their camping ground.

A whistle assured his aunt in waiting that all was well, and she emerged from the wood pile and rejoined her nephew.

"Everything is here!" he exclaimed joyfully. "Hello! What's this?"

He took down a note which was pinned to the trunk of the tree beneath which he had stored his booty.

"A fair exchange," he read, "is no robbery. I recognize our subsistence and therefore take four ears of your roast corn. I judge there are but two in your party, and two ears will be plenty for you—in fact, all you should eat."

The clear ringing laugh of Bob's Aunt Lou echoed through the woods and caught the attention of a young man who was serenely contemplating a despoiled corncob. He smiled appreciatively and turned as if he would fain trace the origin of the echo of mirth, but the people who were boarding the little launch on the river called warningly to him, and he desisted.

The next evening Aunt Lou was putting the finishing touches to an elaborate toilet and Bob was surveying her with admiration and discontent.

"You're going to have a bang up dinner, and I won't be in it," he said dejectedly.

"I shall not enjoy it half as much as I did our stolen feast," she said earnestly. "I have never tasted anything so good as our picnic supper."

"If I am awake when you come home, Aunt Lou, will you tell me all about it?"

"Bob, you little fraud—as if you didn't always stay awake until I return! I'll bring you my souvenir, if we have souvenirs."

Aunt Lou tiptoed down the hall when she returned late that night, passing the door of her little nephew's room.

"Aunt Lou!" he called imperiously.

She opened the door, turned on the electric light and swept across the room to the little white bed.

"Oh, Bob!" she said exultantly. "I've got so much to tell you!"

Bob sat bolt upright.

"Did you have souvenirs?" he asked excitedly.

"Yes," hesitatingly; "but, Bob, dear, I want to keep mine. Look!" And she pointed to a huge bunch of violets fastened to her gown by a dainty little scarfpin.

"Oh, I say, Aunt Lou! That's not fair! You promised!"

"I know. But, Bob, wouldn't you rather have a terrier like Frank's?"

"Sure!" came in eager emphasis. "Say, Aunt Lou, will you, honest?"

"I'll buy you one tomorrow to make up for the pin, but I must tell you what happened. As soon as I was introduced to the man, Mr. Hampton, who was to take me in to dinner, Fred Hunter came up to me and told me an awfully funny story. You know how lend I laugh. It's bad form, but I can't help it. I was so ashamed. I stopped short, but every one was looking at me in surprise, and Mr. Hampton had such a peculiar expression that when we went in to dinner I could think of nothing to say, and no remarks passed between us until the soup course. It was puree of corn, and what do you think? My dinner partner said suddenly, 'Don't you like corn roasted in a bonfire best of any way?' I thought maybe it was only a chance shot, and I tried to look indifferent, but my face betrayed me, and then we both laughed, and I told him all about our game of tramp, and he wants to go with us next time."

"But how did he know?" demanded Bob.

"Oh, Bob, he heard me laugh when I read the note, you know, and he said as soon as he heard me laugh in the drawing room the identity of the thief was revealed. Forgive me, Bob, but I laid all the blame on you. I think I am going to like him, and I had a lovely time, and—altogether, Bob, I'd like to keep the pin if you'd just as soon have the terrier."

Grotesque Courtship.

A Turkish young man may, of course, want a wife, but he has nothing at all to do with looking for one. That is the business of his mother and female relations, who visit several marriageable girls and select one, with whom the bridegroom then exchanges a ring—by messenger. On the day of the betrothal contract an imam gets the assent of the bride elect through the door of the harem, and the two families dine together, neither of the two persons most concerned being present. On the wedding day the bride's trousseau is taken to her husband's house, while she is taken the round of her relatives, and there is much dancing at every house, after which her male relatives exorcise all malign spirits with swords and spears in dumb show of fighting. Finally evening draws on, the bride reaches her husband's home, and everybody clears out, leaving her and her husband to see each other for the first time and to scrape acquaintance as best they can. Under the old Moslem law even speaking acquaintance would have been impossible, as the bride was doomed to absolute silence for a whole month. Now her husband gives her a present at meeting, and she may speak. There are few barbarous tribes in the most benighted of continents where courtship and marriage are more grotesquely conducted. It is lucky for the Turkish suitor that he need not even pretend to be a lover. No ardor could survive the chilling formalities that have to be gone through.—London Globe.

No Such Temerity.

Meekly—Yes, we're going to move to Swamphurst.

Doctor—But the climate there may disagree with your wife.

Meekly—It wouldn't dare!—Philadelphia Ledger.

A WOMAN'S ORDEAL

DREADS DOCTOR'S QUESTIONS

Thousands Write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., and Receive Valuable Advice Absolutely Confidential and Free

There can be no more terrible ordeal to a delicate, sensitive, refined woman than to be obliged to answer certain questions in regard to her private ills, even when those questions are asked by her family physician, and many continue to suffer rather than submit to examinations which so many physicians propose in order to intelligently treat the disease; and this is the reason why so many physicians fail to cure female disease.

This is also the reason why thousands upon thousands of women are corresponding with Mrs Pinkham, daughter-in-law of Lydia E. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass. To her they can confide every detail of their illness, and from her great knowledge, obtained from years of experience in treating female ills, Mrs. Pinkham can advise sick women more wisely than the local physician.

Read how Mrs. Pinkham helped Mrs. T. C. Willadsen of Manning Ia. She writes: Dear Mrs. Pinkham:

"I can truly say that you have saved my life, and I cannot express my gratitude in words. Before I wrote to you telling you how I felt, I had doctored for over two years steady, and I spent lots of money in medicines besides, but it all failed to do me any good. I had female trouble and would daily have fainting spells, backache, bearing-down pains, and my monthly periods were very irregular and finally ceased. I wrote to you for your advice and received a letter full of instructions just what to do, and also commenced to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I have been restored to perfect health. Had it not been for you I would have been in my grave to-day."

Mountains of proof establish the fact that no medicine in the world equals Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for restoring women's health.
