WATERSPOUT IN BAY

Gigantic Column Whirls Its Way Past Pool's Island—Boats Hasten Out of Path.

Any further doubts as to the contention that Maryland is very near the equator, despite what the geographies say, were quite dispelled Friday by a regular equatorial waterspout, with all the fringes and gyrations of the real thing, which appeared suddenly over the Patapsco river in the morning, and for a short time made things interesting for mariners on the briny deep around Sparrows Point.

No one was hurt, not a ship was struck and so far as has been learned the spout departed peaceably, but many a wheel was quickly turned "hard aport" and a number of vessels started for the nearest safespot. There were rumors of injury, and more rumors of wonderful doings of the water column, but these probably will remain a part of contemporaneous history, to be told only after eight bells.

One of these reports was that the spout had run into Pool's Island, split in two, reformed and continued on its gyratory journey down the bay. The mariners who dropped in on Poole's Island, while they saw the spout, report the island to be of the same shape and disposition as before, and assert that, if any damage was done, the waterspout was the sufferer.

It was about 10 o'clock in the morning when something went awry with a cloud which at the moment was just over a point directly in the centre of an imaginary line drawn from Sparrows Point, south, two points west, to Stony creek.

How The Spout Appeared.

A thick shaft of water gushed out of the clond and hovered over the water, far beneath, which rose to meet it in a whirling column. The gyrations became faster until the waterspout was formed, like two ice-cream cones, one right side up, the other upside down. Then it started on a trip down the river.

The first to see it were some of the workmen at Sparrows Point. They hailed others, and in a short time nearly everyone around the work knew that something was happening which doesn't happen every day. Not long after these sighted it the mariners, who were perspiring under their gum coats, saw it also, and whatever boats were in the river gave the spout plenty of room to get by, and at no time tried to split hairs as to whether it was following the rules of the road.

It was raining at the time, and although the heavy fall of water hid the spout to a limited extent the spectators were able to admire at a long and safe range its heavy proportions. It was about as large as Washington's Monument to those on shore and twice that size to those who went near it in their boats.

After five minutes of gyrating, while retaining the perpendicular, it began to show signs of topheaviness, and those who saw it state that the upper part fell over to an angle of about 45 degrees, until the column looked like a rainbow.

1,000 Feet High—Capt. Kirwin.

Capt. J. T. Kirwin, of the steamer Susquehanna, said he saw the waterspout about two miles north of Poole's Island. His attention was called to the phenomenon by H. F. Gibson, who was steering the boat. Captain Kirwin says the spout appeared to be about 1,000 feet high and 200 feet broad at the base. The tower of water was traveling rapidly and struck Poole's Island about 5 minutes after it was first noticed by the crew of the Susquehanna.

Captain Kirwin, who has been sailing the waters of the bay for the past 40 years, said he had seen a half dozen waterspouts in that time, but never one that could compare with this one for size and grandeur of appearance.

Like Tornadoes And Duststorms.

According to the best authorities, waterspouts are similar in formation to whirlwinds, duststorms and tornadoes. Meteorologically the formation of the spout is due to "a strong indiaught upward from the base of a cumulus cloud"

The upper portion of the column is formed of fresh water, which has condensed from the cloud itself, and the lower cone is water picked up from the surface over which the whirling air passes. This, in Frday's phenomenon, was, of course, salt spray drawn up from the waves.

In tropical countries, where waterspouts are quite common, they are considered one of the ever-present dangers to ships, and tales are told of large vessels that have been wrecked by the whirling shafts of air and water. One of the old methods of dealing with waterspouts was to endeavor to shatter them by means of firing cannon from aboard ship. Whether this was ever effectual, seems somewhat doubtful.

Boy Drowned at Fredericktown.—Coroner Frazer was summoned to Fredericktown Thursday afternoon to view the body of Robert Richards, aged 16 years, of Philadelphia, who had been spending the summer with his uncle, Arthur T. Cohee, at Fredericktown, and who was drowned while in swimming in the Sassafras river that afternoon. The unfortunate boy was just learning to swim and ventured out too far. When he found he could not get back he cried for help, and J. F. Kirk, who was in a boat some distance off, started to his rescue, but the boy sank out of sight before assistance could be rendered. The body was found about 20 minutes later. Clarence Cohee, a boy about the same age as Richards, was also in swimming when the accident occurred. A certificate of accidental drowning was given by Coroner Frazer.
