Find New Cure For All Sprains

Remarkable successes with a revolutionary way of treating sprained joins or musscles have been reported by the distinguished French surgeon. Prof. Rene Leriche, of the Medical School at Lyons.

Instead of strapping a sprained joint tightly with plaster or bandages and requiring the patient not to use it for days or weeks, Professon Leriche injects a few drops of a solution of the same novocaine used by dentists for operations on painful teeth. In a few minutes the pain of the sprained joint disappears. The patient is told to go home and forget it. Sometime the pain comes back after a few hours, when another injection is given.

In no instance has Professor Leriche found more than three such injections necessary for a complete and permanent cure. Professor Leriche's theory is an entirely new one of what happens when a sprain occurs. Instead of the older idea that muscles or tendons are torn loose and need time and rest to grow together, Professor Leriche believes that nothing is torn except a lot of tiny nerve endings connecting to the muscles, the muscles and tendons usually being quite undamaged.

Make Big Fuss

These small nerve endings are able, however, to make an enormous fuss about their injury. The myriads of pain messages which they send out call excess blood to the spot and thus cause swelling. This interference with the general circulation of blood may cause real damage. By deadening temporarily with the novocaine the too-vociferous nerves whose injuries really are important to no one but themselves. Professor Leriche breaks the vicious circle of swelling, bad blood movement and so on. Once the insistent false alarm from the nerves has been held off for a day or two everything promptly goes back to normal.
