Well my dear father you have written me a bouncing letter but you surely must have misunderstood Harriet because she is a party to it executed the mortgage with me before she left here since when I saw Mr B told him what was done he saw it on my desk & I consulted him who should be the trustee & he said he feared that by my course the people might think I was broke, so all things are not so bad as you seem to think. I have made the date of the payment on the 1st August until when I cannot site a bill to have it sold & I do not want two postages on it & the other papers bill & answer remittance to Smith, but if I were to die this minute it is here executed for him. I am desirous of going up but must know something certain about my future movements if possible before I leave here. If not I think I must make a desperate push for now I am to work along without something to the fore here under existing circumstances I do not know. Has at best we were not living here as we would desire I cannot well make a worse of it. More anon
