and rushed upon Dick with a drawn knife, but the athletic negro struck him a blow which sent him to the ground a second time. Again Arno arose and rushed upon Dick, striking quick and furiously with his long-bladed weapon, wounding him slightly on the arm. Dick, in self-defense, drew a pistol and fired, the ball striking Arno in the region of the heart.

Thus ended a life of villainy. He had been the dupe of others, and his own bad passions helped to keep up the delusion. He believed that to trick and mislead others was the natural being of man. The love of gold was his ruling passion.

The whole party exonerated Dick from all blame; and had the death of Arno not occurred when it did, the life of neither of our adventurers would have been worth a farthing, for Henrique De Arville, impatient at the delay, came out to meet the party.—On the second day after the death of Arno, the two parties met, and all that Arno knew was buried with him.

The arrival of Henrique De Arville disconcerted all of Harry's well-laid schemes, and deprived him of free intercourse with Antoinette, De Arville being ever at her side during the day. Neither did De Arville pay much attention to Harry. He would salute him politely, but made no effort to cultivate a closer acquaintanceship. But on the second day after De Arville had joined the party, an incident happened which changed the face of affairs.

About noon of the day, as they were riding carelessly along, a body of horsemen were discovered coming towards them. Armond, at a glance, saw their character, and immediately formed his men for their reception. De Arville, Harry and Dick kept in the rear, and were to guard the women.—Harry's first thought was that, in the coming melee with the robber band, he could escape with Antoinette; but the brigands charged the handfull of soldiers with such force that it became a hand to hand contest, and the two were soon as actively engaged as were the soldiers. De Arville and Harry, however, kept close to Antoinette; but one who appeared to be the leader singled out De Arville and pressed him so hard that he forgot all save himself.

Whilst thus engaged, one of the outlaws, who had been hovering on the outskirts of the combattants, made a dash for Antoinette and quick as thought swung her light form from her saddle, placed her in front of him and galloped away.

Harry saw the act, and, swift as an arrow, he turned in pursuit; but an escopet ball stopped his career. Dick who had remained a quiet spectator until the fall of his master, now turned upon the robbers and cut down all who opposed him; but the robbers having accomplished their object turned and fled.

Captain Armond set out in pursuit. De Arville and Dick being the best mounted, soon led the van. It was now a trial of speed, but the pursuers were the best mounted and they were not long in overtaking the retreating foe. De Arville and Dick passed the main body, striking right and left as they rode past. The fellow who had Antoinette was the best mounted of all the outlaws, but the two were rapidly gaining on him, and the race seemed to be which of the two should first reach the thief.

Dick won, and on coming up with him, seized the bridle of the brigand's horse and by main strength threw him back upon his haunches, for which act he received a blow over the head, and had not De Arville run the fellow through the body with his sword, Dick's thick skull would not have been of any service to him.

Antoinette and the robber fell from the horse, and De Arville had barely time to raise her from the ground when the whole band came upon them; but Armond and his men were close at hand, and after a brisk fight they fled.

On returning to the spot where they first encountered the band, their first care was the wounded. Harry way lying with his head raised upon his arm, and Dick, forgetting his own hurts, attended to Melville.—His wound proved to be a flesh wound, but still severe. Dick washed it carefully, and bound it up as best he could. He then washed the blood from his own head, and after he had finished, he turned to Armond and said: "Look a here massy an see how much of dis nigger's hed is a split open; golly gracious, dis all comes of kommin to sich an outlandish place to see de fashions."

"Never mind," said De Arville, coming up just as Dick had finished, "never mind, you shall be amply rewarded for the services rendered."

"Yes, de debble take the 'ward's and de sarvice; dis nig got he hed cut, an just look at massy Harry; he am near ded. Oh! de lor, I wish we war back in de States; I bet you never cotch dis chile in annodder scrape."

Litters were made for those who were unable to ride. The dead were buried as well as circumstances permitted, and they once more set out upon their journey.

The next day, just as the sun was sinking 'neath the western hills, they entered the ancient capitol of the Aztec race. Harry, at the earnest solicitation of De Arville, was carried to his house, where he was immediately attended by a physician, as his wound was becoming extremely painful.

Calisaya or King's Bark was unknown until the middle of the 17th century. Humboldt makes favorable mention of its febrifuge qualities as an antidote to Fever and Ague, Intermittent and Malarious Fevers, in his extensive South American travels.

In 1640 it was used by the Jesuits, who alone at that time possessed the secret of its wonderful tonic properties, and it was sold by them for its own weight in silver.

In 1658, eighteen years after, Sir John Talbot employed it with great success in France in the treatment of Fever and Ague, Dyspepsia, Nervous Affections, Loss of Appetite, Weakness and Debility, Palpitation of the Heart, Diarrhœa, etc. In 1679 he sold the secret of its origin to Louis XIV, by whom it was divulged. It is now the all important ingredient in Drake's PLANTATION BITTERS, and preserved as it is in pure St. Croix Rum, makes a tonic of rare merit, and one that should be upon the side-board of every family. Messrs. P. H. Drake & Co., the sole proprietors of the celebrated PLANTATION BITTERS, are the largest importers of Calisaya Bark in America. The Bark is gathered and cured under the immediate supervision of an agent sent out to Brazil, expressly for that purpose, and aside from a few thousand pounds which are sold to the manufacturers of Quinine, is all used in the preparing of these Bitters, to which they are indebted for their wonderful success as a tonic.
