The Story of Mary Melvin.

All the lessons in courage and determination are not confined to books. Out of the current of daily events there comes an impressive example which has Baltimore as its setting. Among the honor graduates of historic Goucher College is a young girl who has been blind since she was six years of age. The story of her triumph over all obstacles and the laurels she has won in competition with companions possessing the natural advantage of sight is worthy of more than passing notice. Surely there should be no such word as fail in the lexicon of normal humanity in the face of the splendid achievement of Mary Melvin.

It is no great wonder that every member of the faculty, save one, should have advised her against attempting a collegiate course, in view of the heavy handicap under which she labored. With less optimism and high purpose she must have been left to the communion of her own thoughts. Certainly the fields of intellectual beauty and grandeur which are nourished by the masters in literature, science, and art would never have unfolded before her active but imprisoned mind. When she stood forth as the choice of her class in the capacity of Ivy Orator, and received the other honors won by merit alone, the gratification experienced by the faculty was as great as their misgivings had been when she began her course.

Although she had received her elementary education at the Maryland School for the Blind, and had the assistance of her mother during her freshman year at college, she made but little use of the devices usually employed by the blind during the remainder of her college course. The kindness of her classmates, who studied their lessons aloud in her presence, was practically all the assistance she received. A vigorous memory and the faculty of grasping the essential things carried her rapidly forward. A sane mind tenanted a sound body, for she excelled in athletics, and to the academic curriculum she added vocal and instrumental music.

Her future career will be watched with interest, but even if she accomplishes no more than she has already achieved her example will be an inspiration. The Helen Kellers and Mary Melvins shame the whole host of derelicts who cravenly surrender when with self-reliance and strength of will they might just as well succeed.—The Washington Times.

GREATER BALTIMORE.

Through the employment of G. A. Waterman as director of the Associated Boards of Trade of Maryland, this state is the first to have a man trained in commercial organization work to devote his entire time to state wide co-operation in publicity and other lines for the advancement of the material interests of the whole state and all its parts.

Mr. Waterman, who took charge on June 1, will get over the state as soon as practicable, acquainting himself with localities and conditions and rendering whatever services he may in strengthening the local commercial organization and in bringing them into closer touch with each other for the common good.

At an early day the executive committee will issue a statement of the broad policy of the Associated Boards of Trade of Maryland, together with a prospectus of the special lines of work to be followed. Publicity of Maryland, in such ways that each section and every city and town can take advantage of the general publicity, will be the keynote of the policy. A salient feature of the publicity campaign will be the early issuance of a Maryland book.

For the fullest fostering of a co-operative spirit, the executive committee will probably create a general advisory body comprising at least one representative from each organization holding membership in the state association.

The director's temporary headquarters will be in the rooms of the Greater Baltimore Committee, 763 Calvert Building, Baltimore, which, in addition to being a contributing member of the Associated Boards of Trade of Maryland, has placed its quarters and its office force at the service of Director Waterman in order to facilitate his work in behalf of all Maryland.
