His Life Crushed Out.

A horrible accident happened at Dover on October 25th, when John Reynolds, aged 62 years, a resident of the town and for many months night watchman and flagman at the North street railroad crossing, just below the passenger station, was struck by the engine of extra freight train, No. 5098, southbound, and run over. His body was cut and bruised into an almost unrecognizable mass, and scattered along a distance of 50 or more feet from where he was standing. His legs and one arm were completely severed from his body and his head was crushed and bruised on one side. There were no eye witnesses to the affair and the trainmen would not have known that anything had happened had it not been for the engineer seeing a faint light just befors his engine reached the crossing and noting the absence of the light afterwards. The fireman heard a jingling of glass which is supposed to have been the flagman's lantern.

As soon as the egnineer could stop his train he did so and leaving the fireman in charge of the engine, went with the conductor and brakeman back over the ground to see what had happened. The discovery of parts of Reynolds' body strewn along the tracks soon revealed what had happened, and they at once made report to the railroad officials. Undertaker Pritchett, with some difficulty collected the human fragments, made difficult by the mangled condition of a heavy body—Mr. Reynolds having weighed more than 200 pounds—They were removed to the morgue.

Pistol Duel At Easton.

A shooting affray between officer W. H. Lewis and C. C. Stewart, of Easton, occured about 2.30 o'clock Tuesday morning. Lewis gives the following account of the affair:

"It is my duty to light the gas lights after the electric lights go out at 12 o'clock, and I had just lighted the light on South Washinton street, in front of Port street, and had put the ladder back under Mr. Stewarts porch, where I had been keeping it, when I heard him say to W. Lester Ball, the town clerk, that the town authorities would not allow him to build a new porch in front of his residence, but were making a garbage place of the little porch he had by shoving things under it. I then got the ladder out and put it in W. J. Hartnett's yard. Then Mr. Stewart commenced cursing. I told him to stop and to go in the house, but he kept it up.

"I left him and went around the square on my beat, and when I came up Dover street, about 2 o'clock, I met Special Officer Richard Thomas, who told me Mr. Stewart was walking up and down Washington street looking for me. I still kept on my beat down Market Space and West street, and when I came up Port street to Washington street I saw Mr. Stewart across the street. He cursed me and said he was going to kill me. He had a heavy stick in his hand and came across the street toward me, and when he reached the telephone pole on the same side of the street on which I was standing he got behind it, pulled out his pistol and fired at me four or five times in all, one ball passing through my overcoat. I pulled my pistol as soon as I could and returned his fire but he kept dodging behind the pole. When he emptied his pistol he came at me with his stick. The first lick I warded off. When he made the secund lick I grabbed the stick and wrenched it from him and then struck him several times with my club on the head, and, as he had thrown his hands over the back part of his head, the licks came down on them mashing several of them and broke one."

Dr. Travers was called in and said that Mr. Stewart was pretty well used up, but that he could not say he had been shot by any ball from Mr. Lewis' pistol. Warrents for Mr. Stewart's arrest were sworn out before Police Jusaice Tharp.

Improving the Tomato.

Former Representative Thomas A. Bell, of Petersburg, Del., is receiving deserved recognition of his success in improving tomatoes. Following along the lines of Luther Burbank, after several years of systenmatic effort, he has developed a tomato which, in the estimation of hundreds who examined them during the past season, meets all the tests as to size, color, firmness and carrying qualities and yield. The roughness and superabundance of core, usually found in large tomatoes, has also been eliminated. From a patch of 51 square perches he sold 508 baskets of "The Bell," which is at the rate, in round figures, of 27 tons per acre. The latter part of the season his tomatoes were largely bought for seed.

Oysters Good to Eat?

Are oysters good to eat? An eminent dietitian says they are, provided they have not been grown in typhoid infected beds. He not only declares oysters to be a highly nutritious food for persons in good health but highly recommends them also to many dyspepties who can eat nothing with comfort. Unlike most other foods, the oyster contains in itself many of the elements necesary for its own digestion. The larger part of the bivalve is its liver, and the very moment we begin to chew it the digestive juices, with which this organ is plentifully supplied, are released and at once begin furnishing furnishing valuable aid to our stomach. An oyster contains about 10 per cent. of protein together with some phosphorized fat and glycogen. This is a highly nutritive combination and one which can be assimulated by the human stomach without undue strain. Oysters are recommended for most dyspeptics, for sufferers from ulceration or incipient cancer of the stomach and also for convalescents from acute diseases, who usually find in oysters a stimulant for their jaded appetites which no other food can give. The only dyspeptics who should be forbidden oysters, according to the professor, are those whose stomachs are hyper-acid or hypersensitive. The oyster is too irritating a food for such patients, as it is apt to overstimulate the gastric juices with which their stomaches are already too well sapplied.

The returns from the last of the election districts in the county—Federalsburg— did not get in until four o'clock in the morning, and being equally late all over the State there are no returns obtainable at the time of going to press. Blair Lee and the whole Democratic State ticket is elected and the indications are that the Democrats will have a three-fifths majority in the Legisiature.
