A MUCH NEEDED TEXT BOOK

The standard of living in our home county is possibly as high as in any county in the state; certainly it is higher than the standard obtaining anywhere abroad. There is not an American alive who does not feel proud of the superior living conditions of Americans. If the standard is to be maintained, however, the time has arrived for the nation generally to give serious thought to the curbing of waste in living, and to the inauguration of a period of sensible saving. Even the more important is the necessity to press for some reform in our school system which will bring to the youth of the country a deeper understanding of economics and a more sensible idea of the personal budget.

There are forty-four millions of American people now gainfully employed who earn more than $60,000,000,000 yearly. The business of managing such an income is a staggering problem, bewildering, when one considers that every worker is a member of the board of directors. Fully $10,000,000,000 is wasted every year because the directors know nothing of economics .

New York City, for example, spends $65,000,000 every year in charity, but for practical instruction in economics, which if properly applied, would do away with the necessity for charity, it spends not one penny piece. This same condition prevails, in proportionate degree, right here at home. Our school children are not taught how to manage their personal affairs with prudence; they are not taught the value and use of money of the basis of economic living; they gather a smattering of botany, a little geology, possibly interspersersed with a modicum of plain sewing and kindergarten chemical experiments, but nothing at all of the science that lies at the very root of personal prosperity and national development. The teachers are not to blame, but unless there be a change the day of reckoning will be a very black Friday.
