ANNE SPURNS SALLIE'S SUGGESTION

Anne was the center of a gay group that crowded the punch bowl at the far end of the room. She was drinking the "Joy Water" that had been elaborately spiked.

Then too, during those days of abstinence I had learned how pleasant it was to awake with a song on my lips from sheer bodily health, eager to begin the routine of the day without any of the dull aches. But what on earth had happened to Anne? She was partaking freely of the punch and complimenting the "kick" which she declared in loud tones she enjoyed.

My thought raced back to a year ago and I wondered how it was that, just by living, the viewpoint of two persons could have been so changed. It was evidently due to the experiences through which we had passed. With me the result was that I regarded life through more serious eyes, while Anne had apparently been left with the desire to throw discretion to the four winds and taste of a gay career.

"Tell you what, it doesn't pay, this goody-goody business," she announced to anyone of the group who chose to hear. "Used to confine my pleasure to foreign places and be oh so good at home. But I've thought it all out and from now on I'm gonna be wild."

She was feeling the effect of the punch which she was not accustomed to drinking and I saw that the chaperons were beginning to sharpen their claws. I would have spared her the little mean gossip that would be flying from tongue to tongue before dawn.

I made my way quickly to her side.

"Listen, Anne," I whispered, touching her arm, "you're not used to taking anything with such a fancy wallop as this and it's mixing your words. Come along, let's get up to the dressing room until it wears off."

"Go 'way" she commanded, "I know what I'm doing. From now on the tables 're turned, I'm gonna have a good time. D'yer hear? I might as well, so go along."

And she pushed me aside.

Someone caught me by both arms and looking upward I caught the gaze of Curtiss Wright. He had evidently come to the edge of the group and when Anne pushed me I almost fell into his arms. The man with him in the Lieutenant-Colonel's uniform was, of course, his brother of whom I had already heard.

I glanced in Anne's direction. She was staring at the uniformed man at our side. Her face blanched and she turned her head swiftly as if to avoid his eyes, She looked around excitedly and taking Ted Billing's extended arm started in the direction of the doorway —beyond which was the star-flung night, and cars.

"That was splendid of you," Curtiss began. Then he had heard the words that had passed with Anne during the exciting scene.

"No, no," I brushed the compliment aside, "It's just that she isn't used to taking anything and even a little would go to her head."

I don't know why I apologized for Anne except that the suffering I had endured had given me the desire to protect any girl from the heart ache of being gossiped about.

"Be that as it may," Curtiss made an impatient gesture with his hand—that little movement I had grown to know and love so well, "the thing I am most anxious to know is just this, may I have a dance?"

"I'm sorry, but I'm afraid you can't. You see I haven't finished with the fat and forty directors. I'm only half through the struggle now," I sighed extravagantly, "but one must be brave." I tried to be indifferent and my voice sounded light.

"And then, may I?" he was very much in earnest now it seemed.

"I'm afraid you're asking me because I was more or less forced on you," I laughingly replied as I referred to the fact that I had been almost pushed into his arms by Anne.

"I'll prove my search for you by my brother here before that event occurred," he affirmed.

Then he presented his brother who had the perfect manner of an officer and a gentleman. I admired his straight carriage and clean-cut physique. Not at all, thought I, the sort of man who would indulge in gossip unless he had some good reason for the telling of same.

We chatted congenially for a few moments.

"I was wondering if it would be asking too much for the family if I, too, begged for a dance?" he examined my card.

"Must be a whale of a Board of Directors," he teasingly declared. "Look, Curtiss, do these sound like dignified and elderly officers of a club to you?" and he becan calling off the names written opposite each fox trot and waltz. Most of them were of the younger men.

Paul Ellis claimed me and before Curtiss could answer we were off.

WASHINGTON COLLEGE PREPARING FOR FOOTBALL SEASON

With the veterans of her football squad assembling for preliminary practice on Labor Day, Washington College is speeding up her plans for a successful athletic and academic year. On the heels of the inauguration of the fall gridiron season, when Navy, Western Maryland, Mt. St. Mary's, University of Maryland, Lafayette, Pennsylvania Military College, Schuylkill College and other worthy foemen will be met, comes the announcement that the historic Eastern Shore of Maryland school will, for the first time in her history celebrate Founder's Day on October 22. This occasion for which the Governor of Maryland, Albert C. Ritchie, and other notables will come to Chestertown, will mark the 143d anniversary of the foundation of the eleventh oldest college in the country and the first chartered educational institution in Maryland. At that time the Daughters of the American Revolution will unveil a tablet on the wide campus in memory of the fact not only that George Washington came to Chestertown in 1789 to receive at the hands of the college the degree of doctor of laws but that, as a matter of historic record, the Shore college is only school to which the "father of his country" gave his direct consent for the use of his name. In the letter confirming this latter fact the nation's first president also donated a sum of money for educational purposes in his chosen college. It is interesting, in this connection, to note that Dr. William Smith, first president of Washington Collece, was a close friend of both George Washington and Benjamin Franklin and that he later became the first president of the University of Pennsylvania, leaving Chestertown for that purpose. Franklin, as everyone knows, was the real founder of the great Philadelphia institution. There has consequently always been a strong sentimental link between the two schools.

It has just been announced by the Dean's office that the entering freshmen class will number at least 90, bringing the total enrollment to about 200. The incoming students for the fall term represent 10 different states, the largest number coming from Pennsylvania, Maryland and New Jersey. Registration day will fall on September 17 and the 21st of the month will witness the opening of classes. Worthy of note is the appointment of Dr. Fred G. Livinggood or Harvard as professor of education and Dr. John K. Warren of Ohio State University as head of the history department. A new professorship of physical education is in process of foundation and the new appointee will be known as Flying Pentagon professor of physical education, in honor of the exploits of the famous basket ball team of last season which gained nation-wide fame as "the flying pentagon" and which made a record of 20 unbroken victories against some of the strongest quints in the east.

Dr. Albertus Perry, field vice-president of Washington College, has just returned to Chestertown after conducting a party of 25 students on a two month educational tour through 15 foreign countries and over 10,000 miles of travel. In the course of the trip they met many prominent officials and citizens in England, the Continent, the Near East and in Egypt.

President Paul E. Titsworth is back from a tour of West Virginia, Western Maryland, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and is in conference with administrative officers of the college, prior to the opening of school.
