20 OBSERVATION STATIONS TO TEST CAUSES OF RADIO FADING

Investigation of "fading" on a scale never before attempted in the United States will be made in mid-January at 20 observation stations, it was announced today by J. K. Smith of the Stewart-Warner corporation.

Hitherto such experiments have been carried on in isolated sections of the country between two or at most three stations. The results of such research have been negligible. There is still no explanation of why signals should be stronger in the winter than static electricity leaps out of one's hair or sparks out of the rug at one's feet, and weak in summer when there are apparently no static charges in the things about us, according to Mr. Smith.

The Stewart-Warner observation posts will chart readings on selected distant stations every two minutes during the period of the tests. The results will be averaged and plotted on a map similar to that issued by the government weather bureau. It is the belief of the engineers conducting the tests that curves which will make possible a comparison of effects and a search for causes will result. If so, the experiment will be repeated at regular intervals throughout the winter.

"By a comparison of 'fading' and the static curves with those of the United States weather map it will be possible to determine the effect of weather on such phenomena" said Mr. Smith. "By plotting the curves of 'fading' and static in tests on stations of varying wave length, some tangible process may be made toward discovering what frequencies are best for broadcast.

"The plan to hold the tests originated in a discovery that Chicago reception this year has failed to follow the accepted rules. There have been several clear, cold nights on which it has been impossible to hear stations 500 miles distant.

"On the other hand, there have been warm, wet nights entirely free from static and perfect for broadcast reception from distant points."

Willie was driving Pauline through a park in his car. After some time Pauline pointed to the floor.

"What's that?" she asked.

"That, dear, is the brake."

"And what's this?" She indicated a round object.

"That is the speedometer," he said hastily jamming on a brake to prevent running into a taxi.

"But what on earth is this," giving the accellerator a vigorous shove.

"This, my dear, is Heaven," and picking up a harp he flew away.
