MIDWINTER CARE OF YOUR BABY

Speaking of the care that is necessary to keep the well baby well, in midwinter—the season of coughs and colds and pneumonia, Dr. J. H. Mason Knox, Jr., Chief of the Bureau of Child Hygiene of the State Department of Health said: "Many young mothers breathe a sigh of relief when the hot summer season passes, because of the popular opinion that with it has passed the time of greatest danger; and that when the cool weather sets in, their fears for their children can be put aside. The truth of the matter is that within recent years so much improvement has taken place in the care and feeding of the baby in hot weather that this season has lost much of its terror.

In the cold weather disturbances of the respiratory tract such as the 'common cold,' tonsilitis, influenza, bronchitis, pneumonia and other infections are much more prevalent than in the summer. In fact, in many communities they may destroy more lives in the winter than the intestinal diseases do in the summer.

Moreover, the respiratory infections are more difficult to combat. Much however, can be done, by increasing the child's resistance to disease, and by avoiding infection.

Resistance to disease can be increased in the following ways:

First by proper food. In the winter when green vegetables are hard to secure and the milk is from cows fed on grain, it is important to supplement the usual diet with a small quantity of cod liver oil, one to three teaspoonsfulls about one half hour after two meals.

Second by plenty of sunshine. Make the most of all the sunshine there is by having the children out in good weather when the sun is high.

Third, by plenty of fresh air, day and night. Windows should be open at night, but keep the child protected from drafts. If the child develops a cough close the window and provide ventilation from the next room. Do not have the day time temperature of the child's room over 70 degrees.

Fourth, by dressing the child according to the weather. Have additional clothing on when the child goes out. The amount of clothing should be determined by the temperature, not by the season. The baby's feet should be kept warm at all times.

Fifth, by care in bathing. A cool sponge and a rub afterwards with a coarse towel are stimulating and helpful.

We cannot over emphasize the importance of protecting the children from infections. Most infectious diseases common in infancy and childhood are spread through the secretions of the nose and mouth. Therefore, a baby should be protected from this danger by keeping him away from those who have colds, coughs and fevers. A little vaseline in the nostrils at night is helpful in the winter. It is especially important that those suffering from colds, or the various infectious diseases should be careful that they do not cough, or sneeze, or speak so that the droplets of saliva will reach well children.

People who are convalescent from an infectious disease, may carry the infection in the discharges from the nose and throat for several days after they feel well and so spread it to others with whom they come in contact.

The winter is the time when children are brought together in closer contact at home and in the schools, consequently the occurrence of respiratory infections is highest in cold weather.

Summing up those suggestions—to keep the baby or young child well through the winter:

Feed him properly so as to avoid rickets; and build up his resistance to disease.

Dress him according to the temperature.

Keep the house well ventilated and take the baby out in the fresh air and sunlight as the weather permits.

Give him a cool sponge and a vigorous rub down every morning.

Keep him away from every one who has a cold or other respiratory infection.

Effect of Overindulgence

Landlady—I hope you find the turkey tender.

Mr. Growler—H'm-well, so-so. But I fear the bird was an only child, so to speak.

Landlady—Why so?

Mr. G.—Because it seems a trifle spoiled.

How Willie Felt

"Well, son, how do you like the new sister we got for you?"

"Ah, gee, dad!" exclaimed Willie. "A lot of things I needed worse'n a baby."

Youngest Aviator

Photo shows Farnam Parker, thirteen year old pilot of planes and the youngest qualified flier in the world, addressing his radio audience thru the microphone. Don't you envy him, boys?

Children are constantly facing tests and examinations. If they can see clearly and if their eyes are free from strain, they will pass more easily.

Seeing and understanding are closely related. Regular eye examination will help to insure your child's progress.
