Notice to Household Ice Consumers

THE PRESERVATION OF PERISHABLE FOOD

For years ice has been known and used for its food-saving properties. Each year more people learn of its unequalled value and use ice the year round.

Some have asked us if ice will ever be supplanted by electric refrigeration; our answer is NO, for we know what ice does in the preservation of perishable food, and we also know the limitations of the refrigerating machine. It is the purpose of this series of letters to explain the use and advantages of ice refrigeration.

There are three requirements to food preservation, namely: Low temperature, proper humidity and protection against taint. Ice fulfills these requirements.

As the temperature of your refrigerator tends to rise, the block of ice melts to absorb the heat, thereby maintaining a steady low temperature. Ice is more trustworthy than any mechanical thermostat.

The proper humidity is important. If the air in your refrigerator is dry, the natural moisture content of the food stored will be abstracted and the food dry out, wither and lose much of its original value. Perishable food comprises meat vegetable and fruits, which contain from 50 to 94 per cent. water.

Tainted food is dangerous. When food is stored it gives off gases and odors, and if these are not continuously eliminated, all the food in your refrigerator will taint. In an ice-filled refrigerator these gases and odors are absorbed by the film of water surrounding the block of ice and are carried down the drain pipe with the waste water.

Ice is your only means of maintaining the proper humidity and your only protection against taint.
