Poetry.

LOVE YOUR NEIGHBOR.

"Love your neighbors as yourself"—
So the parson preaches;
That's one-half the Decalogue—
So the prayer-book teaches.
Half my duty I can do,
With but little labor,
For with all my heart and soul
I do love my neighbor.

Mighty little credit, that,
To my self-denial;
Not to love her, though, might be
Something of a trial.
Why, the rosy lips that peeps
Through the glass above her,
Lingers around her lips; you see
E'en the sunbeams love her.

So, to make my merit more,
I'll go beyond the letter;
Love my neighber as myself?
Yes, and ten times better.
For she's sweeter than the breath
Of the Spring that passes
Through the fragrant, budding woods,
O'er the meadow-grasses.

And I've preached the Word, I know;
For it was my duty
To convert the stubborn heart
Of the little beauty.
Once again success has crowned
Missionary labor,
For her sweet eyes own that she
Also loves her neighbor.

THE FIRST CLIENT.

BY MRS. S. M. C. PERKINS.

Several summers ago I happened to spend a few weeks in Concord, New Hampshire. My home, for the time being, was in a quiet family who took into their home several members of the State Legislature as boarders. Among these people there was a talented young lawyer and his pretty wife. They were a bright, witty, sensible couple, dressed well, and I looked upon them as fortune's favorites, and wondered if the passing years would fling any shadows in their pathway, or if they had known care or sorrow. The young wife was a sweet singer, and many an evening passed very pleasantly in listening to the piano touched by her practiced fingers, and her songs were like the bird music in early springtime. Her gay laugh would ring out upon the air unmingled by a single note of sadness. The manly husband seemed devoted to his accomplished wife, finding his chief happiness in her society, and as I saw them daily I was reminded of Whittier's beautiful poem, "The wife,' and I fancied, too, was some city's "fair pale daughter,' who had found her husband among the New Hampshire hills. The lines would come to my mind,

"We send the Squire to general court,
He takes his young wife thither;
No happier man, election day,
Rides through the sweet June weather."

Though I became interested in this happy pair yet the weeks glided away and I learned nothing definitely of their history during my sojourn in the city. But another summer came and the same errand took me again to Concord, and I occupied the same old quarters. There were many new faces around the table, but the young lawyer and his wife were in their old seats, and apparently as happy as ever. We met as old acquaintances this time, and one evening we were all out upon the piazza watching the sunset and the crowds of people that promenade at this hour, or rode leisurely past in their handsome carriages.

The conversation turned upon the struggles of young men of limited means in acquiring an education and a profession, and then a foothold in this busy, grasping world.

"I know all about it,' exclaimed Mr. Weston, my young lawyer friend, "I had a time of it to get started, and if the Lord ever gives me plenty of money I shall use a little of it in helping others.'

"Tell me something of your history if you please?' I asked. "I have had all manner of conjectures in regard to it, and now my curiosity must be satisfied.'

"You may not care much for it,' he replied, smiling, "but I think I will tell you about my first client. To me, certainly, it was an interesting case.'

Here his wife slipped her little hand out of his and went quietly into the house, and then I knew she was in some way connected with the story.

"Well, to begin, I was early left an orphan with only sixpence in my pocket, and a jack-knife to whittle with. I believe I had a good share of energy, or pluck, as they say, for I went through college, and studied law, supporting myself and owing no man a dollar. But the tug of war came when I went to the village of W., where I now live, and hung out my shingle, expecting that business would come of course. But weeks dragged into months and no work came.

Sometimes I would get a little writing to do, but the other lawyers took all the important cases, and I hardly earned enough to pay my board bills. Every morning I rose very early and took a long walk, then carefully swept my office and arranged my books, so that if business did come I could be ready for it. But the months glided away and still I had nothing to do. Finally I began to get a little discouraged, and wondered if I had not mistaken my calling. I sometimes wished myself in Burmah, teaching the heathen, or anywhere else than in that quiet village. At length, one day in a fit of desperation, I looked over my affairs, took an inventory of my possessions, which consisted of a few law books and two seedy suits of clothing, and asked myself what had better be done; I could endure this waiting no longer. "Try your luck somewhere else, John; I said to myself, "these old staid New England villages went to seed thirty years ago. Go to Kansas and start afresh! That is just what I'll do if no work comes this week.'

But at the close of that very day there came a low knock at my office door. I knew that it was not any of the fellows who sometimes came in to chat awhile, and I threw down my newspaper and opened the door. There stood a very handsome young lady dressed in mourning, and I was a little frightened and awkward, but I asked her to come in and take a seat.

"Mr. Weston, I believe,' she asked.

"Yes, at your service.'

"I am Minnie Ellery,' she said, with a low musical voice, "and I came to consult you on business.'

"I shall be happy to hear your story,' I answered, "as I have a little leisure just now.'

I was in a flutter of delight that Miss Ellery had chosen to consult me on business, yet I believe that I distinctly heard all that she told me.

It seems that she was an adopted child of the rich Mr. Ellery, who had recently deceased. The old gentleman had never had legal papers of adoption made out; he had not regarded it as necessary, as the child had been given to his "care by her mother on her death-bed.' He had given her a happy home, and carefully educated her as his own daughter. Several years previously he had made a will, in which he had given her the bulk of his property, after providing handsomely for his wife during her lifetime. But now two brothers of the deceased came boldly forward and claimed the property, and the will could not be found.

"The will must be found,' I exclaimed, in my excitement, "you must look again.'

She shook her head in sadness. "I have looked over every scrap of paper in papa's writing desk and safe and library, and mamma has helped me, but the will cannot be found.'

"Have you any suspicion that either of these uncles have privately obtained possession of the missing will?' I asked.

"None at all!' she frankly answered.—"They have had no access to the papers; it is all a mystery.'

I promised to do my best for this lady—my first client—and told her to renew her search for the important paper, and I would call at her house the next day; we would again talk the matter over and see what could be done.

Well, I could not sleep much that night; I looked up my authorities to see what could be done in case the will could not be found, and had determined upon my course, when I presented myself at the Ellery mansion the next morning. As Miss Minnie came into the parlor to greet me, she seemed more lovely than on the previous evening, and I was charmed especially with her thoughtful attentions to her adopted mother. They had made another search for the will, but with no better success. I inspired them with courage by stating that under the circumstances the suit might be gained without it, particularly as one of the witnesses could readily be obtained, and I believe the right would prevail.

I became so much interested in my fair client and her case, that I forgot all about my Kansas project, and prepared myself for the trial. I thought of it by day and dreamed of it by night.

The brothers of the deceased were sure of winning their suit, and employed the most skilled Attorney in the State to assist them to secure their claim. As the time drew near for the trial I was deeply anxious, as my future might depend upon my success in this suit. I retired to rest one night burdened with the care in regard to it. "If a kind Providence would only put that will in my hands.' I exclaimed, mentally, "I would never doubt him in the future.'

When at last I fell asleep I was still busy with my law business. I dreamed it was the day before the trial, and full of anxiety, I had called at the Ellery mansion and humbly asked leave to search the house myself for the missing will. Leave was readily obtained, and the fair Minnie went with me to open closets, writing desks, &c.

"Have you cleaned house since the death of your father?' I asked.

"Yes,' she answered, laughing heartily at the strange question; "we had our yearly cleaning in May.'

"Where did you put your waste papers that you regarded as of no account?'

"We threw a great many of them into the kindling basket, but a few that we fancied we wanted to look over again we carried to the attic.'

"Then I will go to these upper regions, if you please, and will look over every scrap of paper that has any writing upon it.'

We proceeded to the attic, and found a large wood box full of old letters, and began to look them over. Before we had been there an hour, I came to a bundle of paper with a green ribbon and opening the bundle, the lost will was in my hands. I jumped upon the floor in my joy, exclaiming, "Eureka!" and put it in my pocket enjoining silence upon Minnie, who, of course was as delighted a child, and fairly wept for joy.

In a transport of ecstacy, I awoke to find it only a dream; but soon I slept again and the whole scene was repeated.

When I awoke again, old Chanticler was announcing the dawn of day, and I arose, fully determined to search the Ellery attic. Who knows but it may be true?—God revealed his will in ancient times in dreams. May he not sometimes do it still? I thought of the cases given in mental philosophy, the sister of Major Andre dreaming that her brother was before the court-martial for being a spy; and all the particulars of the trial were vividly impressed upon her mind, just as they really occurred. Washington and Knox were particularly designated, though she had never seen them, for the waves of the broad Atlantic rolled between them.

I was so much in earnest that I did not wait even for breakfast, but went to call upon Minnie, I put the same questions as in my dream, and by a strange coincidence, received the same answers. We went to the attic and the lost will was in my possession in less than an hour after I entered the house. Then I went to breakfast and ate with a relish, for I was as happy as if I had a million of dollars in my pocket. I knew that the tide of my affairs had turned at last, and I was in the way of a little good fortune.

The day of the trial came, and the judge and jury were all in their places, and the court house was crowded with people, for Minnie was a favorite in the village, and the case was exciting the deepest interest. We had kept the secret of the will being found, and the lawyer of the uncles opened his case with a flourish of trumpets of what was natural and just, that the property should go to legal, family heirs, instead of a stranger's child, who had already, for fifteen years, enjoyed the charity of her kind benefactor. True, he had learned that there was once a rumor of a will, but had such a document ever existed it had probably been destroyed by the same hand that made it, as there was no trace of it as he could learn.

When it came my turn to speak, I simply announced that the lost will was found, and proceeded to read it word for word.—When I had finished the crowd began to cheer, and this over the judge decided the case on the spot without it going to the jury. Minnie and her mother came and stood beside me, and together we received the congratulations of the villagers. It was the happiest day of my life, for that very evening I asked Minnie to marry me, and she said yes, and I believe she has never yet regretted. I had business enough after that, the people trusted me, and I have tried to do my duty. I am now in the Legislature and may yet turn up in Congress, or be Governor of the State. At any rate I am a happy and contented man, and grateful to a kind Father for all his love and care.

This ended the story of the lawyer's first client. I was deeply interested, and from that evening we were friends. Last summer these New Hampshire friends were my guests for a week, in my new home on the banks of the Susquehanna. We rowed together over the placid waters of the Otsego Lake, and ate our pic-nic dinners upon the shores, and lived over again those summers at Concord.

Time, that had brought so many changes to me and mine, had left them the same, prosperous and happy. The young wife's voice is as musical as ever, and though the husband is not yet in Congress, when he is there he will be the right man in the right place.

Great Salt Lake.

On the west of the lake, north end of the Cedar mountain, the Great Desert begins—some five thousand square miles of sand and alkali, only a few feet higher than the lake. Doubtless it was once a part of the lake, and possibly it will be again, for the surface of the lake has risen some fifteen feet since its first survey by Stansbury, in 1849, and as much more will cover much of that desert. Straight south the Oquirrh range rises very abruptly from the end of the lake, there being barely room for wagon and railroad to pass; in fact, it is assumed by geologists that the Antelope Islands is but a continuation of that range, the break between covered by the salt water flowing over a low pass.—Twenty miles or so away I can make out the peak on which I stood six weeks ago and took a general view of this and Rush lakes and the adjoining valleys. It is often said there is no living thing in Great Salt Lake, but this is not strictly true.—There is a minute animalcule at the bottom, resembling a fine shaving of the skin from one's finger more than anything else I can compare it to. As it grows in size it beats in towards the land by the actions of the waves, and finally swells up into the likeness of a worm and floats upon the water. The boatmen think that the flies, which are so numerous around the edges of the lake breed from this worm, and this idea is strengthened by the fact that the empty hulls of the worm, like abandoned shells of chrysols, float on the water in large sections, extending in long dark lines for hundreds of feet. At first I supposed these collections were merely the bodies of drowned flies, but on examination they proved to be the husks, so to speak, of what had been worms. All sorts of attempts have been made to propogate life in the lake, or mouths of the affluent streams, but one and all have failed. Oysters have been planted at the mouths of the rivers, but when the wind was up stream the dense brine from the lake, setting into the river's mouth killed them. Jordan was stocked with eels a year or two ago, but they floated down into the lake and died. One was picked up long afterwards on the eastern shore, completely pickled. The finder cooked and ate it, and found it very palatable. Gulls and pelicans abound in places around the lake, feeding on the flies and worms. Captain Stansbury reports finding a blind pelican which had been fed by its companions and kept fat. At points where grassy marshes border the lake the buffalo knats are numerous and troublesome. There are indications that buffalo were abundant in this basin a hundred years ago. The Indians say the Great Spirit changed them all into crickets! The latter were very destructive to the first crops of the Mormons, until the gulls came in immense flocks and ate them up. The Mormon historian in pious gratitude says: "There were no gulls in the country before the Mormons came.' In one meaning of that word this is on a part for factiousness with that statement in the Book of Mormon: "Great darkness overspread the land; yea, darkness wherein a fire could not be kindled with the dryest wood.

If your girl, or her big brother, comes along and points a pistol at you, and tells you to walk down to the the minister's and be married, go right along and do it; the marriage will be bogus. That has recently been decided by the Supreme Court of New York.

FOR THINKING PEOPLE

There are a few, perhaps half a dozen

Sewing Machines

of real excellence, differing from one another more or less in principle, construction and adaptation; one being suitable for tailoring, another for bootwork, another for family use, &c., &c., the rest are inferior, and by far the greater number

ARE WORTHLESS.

It is note worthy that the sewing machine for which the highest premium was awarded at the World's Fair in New York in 1853, long since sunk into merited oblivion. The past fifteen years has seen numerous machines with high sounding pretensions, rise with a flourish, confound the simple and vanish.—So will it be while credulity lasts.

Time Tries all Things.

Use only furnishes the final test. As the purchase of a Sewing Machine is, or may be, the act of a life-time, care should be taken to get what time and use have approved.

During the past six years the Howe Machine Co. have made and sold over
