The Widow and the Judge.

Sometime about the commencement of the year 1871, a train was passing over the Northwestern railroad, between Oshkosh and Madison. In two of the seats facing each other, sat three lawyers engaged at cards. Their fourth player had just left the carriage, and they needed another to take his place.

"Come, Judge, take a hand," they said to a grave magistrate, who sat looking on, but whose face indicated no approval of their play. He shook his head, but this apparent refusal only increased their eagerness to secure him.

"O, yes, yes! We cant get along without you, Judge! Come, only just one game.' They persisted in their urgency, until finally, with a flushed countenance, the Judge slowly rose and took a seat with the players, and the playing went on.

A venerable woman, gray and bent with years, sat and watched the Judge from her seat near the end of the railway carriage. After the game had progressed awhile she arose as if urged by some strong impulse, and tottered forward along the aisle until she stood face to face with the Judge.

"Do you know me?' she said, in a tremulous voice.

"No, my good woman," said the Judge, while he and his companions looked at her inquiringly. "Where did I ever see you before?'

"You seen me at court in Oshkosh, when my son was tried for—for robbin' somebody; and you sentenced him to prison for ten years—and he died there last June." .

The tears began to chase each other down the aged woman's face, and the card players seemed to have forgotten their game, as she went on:

"He was a good boy, if you did send him to prison, Judge; for he cleared our farm, and when his father took sick and died he did all the work. He was a stiddy boy till he got to card-playin' and drinkin', and then he'd be out all night at it, every night gamblin' away money, and he went down and down."

Overpowered with her emotions she stood weeping in the aisle, while the crowd of passengers gathered around, leaning forward to hear her story. She continued:—

"He ran away finally and took with him all the money there was on the farm. I didn't hear from him for five years, and then he writ me that he had been arrested. I sold my house to git money to help him, and went on to Court. There's 'Squire L——, (pointing to one of the four euchre players) the lawyer that argued agin him—and you, Judge, sentenced him ten years to the State-prison.'

The old lady shook with emotions and her voice was choked and broken with grief, as she gasped out:—

"O, it does seem to me that if my boy had never larnt to play keards he wouldn't 'a gone down—an' he'd been alive now!'

The Judge and his companions, and all that stood around, were melted to tears by the power of the old woman's words.—There was no more card-playing in that carriage; the players threw their cards away, and some of them it is believed determined to play no more. That desolate, broken-hearted woman had taught them a lesson which they will never forget.

Possibly some one who reads these words may have inquired, "What is the harm of a social game of cards? Respectable people play cards, Judges play cards, fashionable people play cards, what hurt does it do?'

Could they have witnessed that scene, and marked the anguish of that widowed, childless, broken-hearted mother; and could they read the history of hundreds of young men who have been allured to their ruin by these "harmless games of cards," however strong might be their confidence in their own ability to withstand temptation, they would, for the sake of others who are weaker and are in danger, put away these implements of temptation, and say in the language of the apostle, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no more flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." Rom. viii. 13.

We have no right to make our liberty a stumbling block to unwary souls. Let us solemnly consider our responsibility, and let the lesson which the Judge received that day, be a lesson to others to beware of placing temptation in the way of those around them, or by their action setting an example which others may follow to their own destruction.—Wayside.

The Silence of Christ.

A careful study of the gospel history convinces us that the silence of Christ is not less remarkable and significant than his speech. We have often considered the words of the Lord Jesus; it may be for our advantage to dwell for a little on his silence. We can recall many occasions when he spake as man never spake; there are some not less noteworthy, when he held his peace and answered nothing. If we look to God's Word we find that the practical management of life is made to depend very much on our knowing, where, and how long to keep silence. The art of silence is a greater and much more difficult one than that of speech, and consequently is much less studied and practiced. For once that we sin through keeping silence we all of us, even the most taciturn, sin many times through unwise and immoderate speech. We have all of us need to ask the Lord to set a watch before our mouths, and keep the door of our lips, that we speak not unadvisedly. Some people have much more need than others to cultivate the habit of keeping silence. The besetting infirmity of some is to speak too much and too often, and speaking so much they often speak rashly, unadvisedly, unwisely.—T. W. Morris.
