At the White House.

A correspondent of the Interocean gives the following graphic description of the President:

President Hayes is an early riser. He gets up at 7 in the morning, and seldom retires before midnight. Before breakfast, which is served at 8 o'clock, he looks over his private correspondence of the previous day, which is thrown out of the bushels of letters received by every mail at the White House.

This mail is something surprising, let me say by way of parenthesis. Usually the letters for the Executive Mansion are carried from the post-office by a messenger on horseback—an orderly who awaits at the President's door to do his errands—but since the 4th of March it has been necessary to send it down in a wagon specially detailed from the Postoffice Department for the purpose. When the mail is received it is assorted by one of the clerks, and the private letters—marked personal—for the President are laid aside, to be opened by his son, Mr. Webb Hayes, who has a desk in the Executive Chamber. The other clerks are in ante-rooms. A great many letters marked personal are deceptious, being merely applications for office, sent under the cover of that word, with the supposition that they would reach the President's eye but they seldom do, for Mr. Webb Hayes, when he opens the mail reserves only those letters which he thinks the President would care to see; and when the rest are turned over to Mr. Rogers who has charge of the official mail.

Early in the morning the President reads over these private communications; and has a short hand writer by him, to whom he dictates whatever replies are necessary. This usually takes an hour, and after he has eaten his breakfast he is ready for official duties. The first thing in order is his morning consultation with Mr. Rogers, his official secretary. This generally begins at 9 o'clock and lasts an hour, in which Mr. Rogers submits to him myriads of matters requiring his attention, and receives instructions regarding them.

If the President has time, the office-seekers are admitted to the Executive Chamber in detachments of five or six at a time, when the President listens briefly to their stories. He makes no promises, but often makes a pencil memorandum on their papers, which, however, they are seldom, if ever allowed to see. These interviews are cut very short. The President says:

"I have little time sir, be brief."

If the man is inclined to be longwinded, the President turns to the next, and says:

"What can I do for you sir?" and he generally profits by the example of his predecessor.

The disappointed men cut off in the midst of his statement, comes again another day, and reduce his petition to the requisite brevity. None of the applicants are allowed to sit down. The chairs are all removed, and their statements are made standing. Often when they are only a few people waiting, the President will leave the Chamber and go into the ante-room, where he will listen to each by turn for a few moments and then retire again to the executive Chamber.

At 12 o'clock the Cabinet meets nearly every day, and the session generally lasts till 2 o'clock. After 2, no one is ever admitted except by special appointment, for the President must have some time to attend to other duties besides the hearing of applications for office. He generally lunches at the conclusion of the Cabinet meeting, and often after lunch enjoys a romp with his little boy Scott in the wide walls of the White house. Sometimes he goes down in the conservatory to smell the flowers; and on pleasant days he often takes a short walk for exercise, or a ride. Generally one of his sons, or one of the young ladies who are visiting Mrs. Hayes, accompany him, and sometimes a Cabinet officer gets into the carriage to talk business during the ride. Last week he took both Hampton and Chamberlain out with him.

After he has gotten a breath of fresh air he returns to the Executive Chamber and works with Mr. Rogers until 6 o'clock, when he dines.

During the Cabinet meting, or at other hours when the President cannot see visitors, Mr. Rogers comes into the ante-room and hears what the people in waiting have to say. No one but they know what his answers are, but he is patient, gentle and kind.

After his dinner the President always "relaxes" for a while. He generally has a friend to dine, but he won't "talk shop" to anybody before the family. For an hour or so after dinner he takes a little rest, talks with his guests, or goes out for a stroll in the dark. Then he returns to the Executive Chamber, where he remains till midnight, directing letters, or giving instructions to his secretaries.

Mrs. Hayes receives a great many visitors during the day, and in the day, and in the evening she is what is called "a lovely lady," gentle, refined, but plain and unassuming. Domestic in her tastes but qualified to fill any place or assume any cares. The nation will love her.

DEATH FROM A TIN TRUMPET.—A peculiar accident caused the death of a lad in Cincinnati, a few days ago. He was playing with a party of boys, who tried to get from him a tin trumpet he was blowing.—To prevent them from obtaining the trumpet, the lad ran down the street at full speed, and, as he turned the corner of a street, tripped on a curbstone, and fell violently to the ground. He had the trumpet in his mouth, and, notwithstanding its tip was protected in the usual way, the instrument was driven into the right side of his neck, severing the jugular vein. His comrades picked him up and carried him to his home, where he bled to death in a few minutes.

Why is the letter "s" like a lamb? Because it is the beginning of sheep.

We cannot be undersold, Easton prices to the contrary notwithstanding.
