MURDER WILL OUT.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, writing from Cambridge, Ohio, says:

Some twenty years ago a drover and cattle buyer was known to have gone down in this county for the purpose of gathering up a drove of horses and cattle for the Baltimore market. He was known to have had considerable money upon his person, and was last seen at dusk as he left a little town called Whigsville on his way to another called Sarahsville, about four miles distant. He said to his host at the former place that he would ride on and reach the latter place by bedtime. Nothing more was thought of the matter at Whigsville for several weeks, until some friends of the drover came there inquiring for him, and then it was discovered that he had never reached Sarahsville at all. It is remembered by the good people of Whigsville that the night on which the drover departed for the village became very dark, and they saw that murky clouds overhung the sky in every part, and vivid flashes of lightning, followed by terrific peals of thunder came in rapid succession. It was not till late at night that the threatened rain began to descend.

The friends of the man who had thus suddenly disappeared made as careful an investigation into his disappearance as it was thought possible to make under the circumstances. He had no near relatives having lived a life of celibasy, and thus the matter died out sooner than it otherwise might have done. But the people of that section remembered the mysterious disappearance and related during all the intervening time, curious legends of the probable manner of his taking off. Old settlers have departed from the stage of existence and another generation has been born, and still on stormy nights and during certain seasons of the year the story is related by old wives, and children are made to shudder and draw closer around the cabin beneath.

THE DREAMER.

But within the week the mystery has seemed to have as superstitious and wonderful a partial solution as it had origin.

A young lady, not yet eighteen years of age, and who was accordingly born some two years after the drover's disappearance, and could only have heard the story as a tradition, had a wonderful dream, which was, in short, that the drover had been murdered and his body concealed in a certain spot. Hearing the peculiar circumstances of the case your correspondent called upon the young lady. She was found at her parental home, an unpretentious farm residence situated upon the hillside. She is of light complexion, rather retiring in manner, not especially pretty, but possessing remarkable eyes. They are large, and although bright, still possess an indescribable dreaminess that cannot fail to attract attention. Upon being presented to a stranger she displayed the diffidence natural in one unused to the ways of the world. But upon my remarking that I had come to hear her relate her dream, she seemed to regain possession of herself, and keeping her eye fixed upon the ground, spoke, almost word for word, as follows:

THE DREAM.

"I had heard the story of the disappearance of the drover, twenty years ago, just as every one has in these parts, and I had dwelt upon it much in my thoughts. It seemed to me very strange and very unjust and I could not rest within myself and have it all remain a mystery. So had I been thinking last Thursday night after I retired, and upon dropping asleep I think I immediately began to dream. It seemed to me that I was in a place familliar to me, though on account of the great darkness I could not certainly recognize landmarks.—Presently the lightning began to flash and the thunder to roar, and between the flashes I began to see where I was. I knew it was the portion of the road about a mile beyond Sarahsville, towards Whigville. I was walking along, but at length I sat down and something seemed to say, "Wait and see what will happen." I did so, and almost immediately I beheld a man, a stranger to me riding up the hillside.

He seemed in great haste, and I thought he was hurrying on to Sarahsville before the rain should come. So far as I was concerned I did not care to seek shelter, but something seemed to call my attention to the stranger. Almost immediately I saw another man emerge from the darkness of a fence corner opposite, and with a heavy club or bludgeon in his hands he ran up behind the man on horse back and dealt him a fearful blow on the head. There was a fall, a groan and then I seemed to awake; although, as I am now certain I did not. That was simply a part of the dream. When I next looked the murderer was concealing the dead body in a huge hollow tree. I recognized this place also and still awaited further developments.

The murderer next took the money from the saddle bags and placed it in a large bag of his own, and, taking the saddle from the horse, turned him loose. Then taking the money in his hands he started away. As he did so a flash of lightning, shining full upon his face, revealed William Styles: my father! I then screamed in reality and awoke. At first I thought nothing in particular of the peculiar revelation, deeming it only a nightmare, but the more I thought of the matter the more it impressed me, and I was absolutely led to go to the spot where it seemed to me the body was concealed.

THE DISCOVERY.

"Did you find anything that resembled the spot pictured in your dream?'

"Certainly; I recognize the spot shown in the dream and knew that I could go directly to the spot. Upon arriving there and examining the ground I found nothing remarkable, but I was not satisfied with a superficial ex[illegible] the rotten wo[illegible] have heard.'

"A skeleton, which you are convinced is that of the dead drover.

She bowed her head, but made no audible reply.

"What is the truth in regard to the finding of portions of a saddle supposed to be that of the lost drover?' asked I.

"Oh, I should have remarked as I proceeded with the story of my dream,' she said, "that the murderer seemed to hide the saddle beneath a pile of leaves and brush not far away, first digging a hole in the ground.'

"Did you search here?'

"No, I didn't; but after I had discovered the skeleton and had told about it to some of the people I told them where to dig for the saddle, and they did so, and found all that could have remained of it through the years, viz: the stirrups, the buckles, &c.,' much decayed with rust.'

Thanking the young lady for her courtesy in relating her dream, and filled with wonder that her account should so closely have followed that of the neighbors, I went away to make further inquiries. I found that the bones, after lying in a state for a day or two, had been interred in the graveyard; that the portions of the saddle found were still on exhibition, and I examined them. They consisted of one stirrup and two buckles, all exceedingly old and eaten with rust. They are kept at the harness maker's.

Upon inquiry among the people of the town it was discovered that considerable suspicion, wholly on account of the dream, fastens upon Mr. Styles, the father of the girl, but as he is dead already, no criminal prosecution will probably be begun against him at present. It was remembered that he had for many years before his death been noted far and wide as the most consummate coward in the whole region. He could hardly be persuaded to go out at night, and during thunder storms his fear was fearful to behold. He usually betook himself to his cellar and covered his face with his hands in an ecstacy of agony.

All in all, the case is certainly one of the most peculiar and interesting upon record. My account of it as given above reads more like an extravagant story than a careful adherence to facts, but never was there a more painstaking effort made to arrive at the truth, and what was obtained has been recorded.

Home Life a Hundred Years Ago.

One hundred years ago not a pound of coal nor a cubic foot of illuminating gas had been burned in the country. No iron stoves were used, and no contrivances for economizing heat were employed until Dr. Franklin invented the iron framed fire place which still bears his name. All the cooking and warming in town and country was done by the aid of fire kindled on the brick oven. Pine knots or tallow candles furnished the light for the long winter nights, and sanded floors supplied the place of rugs and carpets. The water used for household purposes was drawn from deep wells by the creaking "sweep." No form of pump was used in this country, so far as we can learn, until after the commencement of the present century. There were no friction matches in those days, by the aid of which a fire could be easily kindled; and and if the fire "went out" upon the hearth over night, and the tinder was damp so that the spark would not catch, the alternative remained of wading through the snow a mile or so to borrow a brand of a neighbor. Only one room in any house was warm unless some of the family was ill; in all the rest the temperature was at zero during many nights in the winter.—The men and women of a hundred years ago undressed and went to their beds in a temperature colder than that of our modern barns and woodsheds, and they never complained.

Lemons Said to Have Cured Cases of Consumption.

A correspondent of an English medical journal furnishes the following receipt as a cure for consumption: Put a dozen whole lemons in cold water and boil until soft (not too soft), roll and squeeze until the juice is all extracted, sweeten the juice enough to be palatable, then drink. Use as many as a dozen a day. Should they cause looseness of the bowels, lessen the quantity, and use five or six a day until better, then begin and use a dozen again.

By the time you have used five or six dozen you will begin to gain strength and have an appetite. Of course as you get better you need not use so many. Follow these directions and we know you will never regret it if there is any help for you. Only keep it up faithfully. We know of two cases where both patients were given up by the physicians, and were in the last stages of consumption, yet both were cured by using lemons according to the directions we have stated.

One lady in particular was bedridden and very low, and tried everything that money could procure, but all in vain, when, to please a friend she was finally persuaded to use lemons. She began to use them in February and in April she weighed 140 pounds. She is a well woman to-day and likely to live as long as any of us.

It may seem preposterous that the Most High can find satisfaction in any fallen creature, as a father in a son. But it must be remembered that all the victories of grace are in the domain of the miraculous. The impotent, distorted, scarred and blasted soul is recreated in the image of God. Jesus is not only a great Teacher, but also a great Healer. He is a Physician, as well as a Prophet. All power is given unto Him in earth and in heaven, and He works as notable miracles to-day as in the time of His incarnation. He can take all the crookedness out of a man, wash him from filthiness, and present him faultless and pure before his Father. The "spiritual miracle" [illegible] says, "was the [illegible] the image of God.

Training Boys for Husbands.

If I had sons I should try to surround them with such influences as would make them crave beauty all their lives. They should be taught to love the best books, the finest pictures, the highest music, and more than all, kind words and thoughtful deeds. There is no reason why the life of a boy should be a barren, unpractical life, missing that which trains the heart to love beauty. I ask you, mothers, if you are doing as much in this way for your sons as for your daughters? You smile and ask how any difference can exist between the surroundings of boys and girls in the same house.—But, I say, there is a difference.

You, in the first place, give your boys the smallest, darkest, ugliest bed rooms in the house. If you don't believe it go up stairs and see. Possibly your hired help has a worse room. If you have a dingy, half worn carpet, it is 'good enough for the boys.' If you have a cracked mirror or a creaky chair, ditto. They have nothing but a rickety table or a dusty mantle on which to put their things, and if they possess a closet in which to hang their clothes they are fortunate. Is it strange that boys in such apartments throw down their clothes, never thinking by whom they are to be picked up? Is it strange that in rooms so barren of petty conveniences, they kick shoes and stockings in all directions?

Girls, I know, love dainty loveable rooms—rooms in which they can read and write, and dream their youthful dreams, in a seclusion which is dear to every one. It seems to me that boys would prize the same refining privilege, would like to entertain their favorites as girls do, surrounded by what is graceful and sweet. O, mothers and sisters, don't go on thinking that we girls must have a monopoly of the delicate, refining and beautiful things of life! Don't put your mind so much on the adornment of your own rooms that you can't make a slipper case or a watch holder, or a set of mats for the boy's chamber. Don't spend so much time looking at your prettily framed engravings that you forget the hideous chromo which glares on Johnny every time he goes to bed. No, give the boys good books, pictures, everything you can which you would enjoy yourselves. They will be used to them and will not do without them, and when they are men, their wives will not tremble to ask for a dollar with which to buy anything they choose.

The Scriptures make a clear distinction between the reconciliation of the sinner and the subsequent salvation of the reconciled sinner. To be acquitted of guilt, to be purified from all transgression, to be reconciled to the Father, is the initial step in the acceptance of redemption in Jesus Christ. To be saved from the animus, nature, and tendency to sin, to be filled with the Spirit, to have all the mind of Christ, is a work of grace over and above the former. The death of Christ is the basis of merit on which the former experience rests. By virtue of the death of the cross all legal barriers are swept away, and God can be just and the justifier of him that believes in this sacrificed death. But the death of the Cross is not recognized in Scripture as the power that saves, in the critical sense of that word. The life of Christ—the post-resurrection life—imparted to the reconciled sinner through the Holy Ghost, is the divine element that brings salvation in all its fullness.

The death of the cross accomplishes the negative work of restoring fallen man into the image of the heavenly. Subsequent to this necessary negative work, the Holy Ghost communicates the real, spiritual, divine life of Christ to the disciple, and he is saved.

The Man Who Stops His Paper.

Philip Gilbert Hamerton in his admirable papers on "Intellectual Life," thus talks to the man who "stops his paper:" "Newspapers are to the civilized world what the daily house talk is to the members of the family—they keep up our daily interest in each other, they save us from the evil of isolation. To live as a member of the great white race that has filled Europe and America and colonized or conquered whatever territory it has been pleased to occupy; to share from day to day its thoughts its cares its inspirations, it is necessary that every man should read his paper. Why are the French peasants so bewildered at sea? It is because they never read a newspaper. And why are the inhabitants of the United States, though scattered over a territory fourteen times the area of France, so much more capable of concerted action, so much more alive and modern, so much more interested in new discoveries of all kinds, and capable of selecting and utilizing the best of them? It is because the newspapers penetrate everywhere, and even the lonely dweller on the prairie or in the forest is not intellectually isolated from the great currents of public life which flow through the telegraph and press."

Men and horses are the only animal that sweat. In violent motion, their respiration is increased, but not sufficiently to carry off the surplus heat, hence they both perspire through the skin, the pores of which become enlarged or opened, and while in this condition both are exceedingly liable to injury. No horse should be allowed to remain standing in a cold draught when heated and wet with perspiration, without a good warm blanket covering.—The ox cools off by rapid breathing, the dog does the same, and in the hottest July sun he dashes into the cold brook coming out refreshed, having no perspiration to check. Let man or horse make the same plunge in a heated state, and perspiration would be suddenly checked, endangering life or producing acute inflammation.

The kind of flower oftenest raised by the mothers of unruly boys—The "lady slipper."

Why is sympathy like blind man's buff? It is a fellow feeling for a fellow creature.

Ladies can be suited in any article in my line, in point of quality, style and price. A call is all that is necessary to convince; for I do not boast of selling the best goods for the least money.
