Spring Hats.

The sensible and thrifty milliners have decreed that large hats shall be the fashion this spring. In this decision they have done a good thing for their fair customers as well as themselves. A large hat cannot be used two consecutive seasons with the same ease that a small one can, because the feathers and trimmings upon a small hat will hide the little material of which the groundwork is composed, and the average person cannot tell whether such a hat belongs actually to winter or spring. But the big hat displays surface enough to attract attention to its material, and a large plush, velvet or felt hat cannot be worn with impunity during a season when straw is the proper material for female headgear. Hence the milliners have been wise in their day and generation by decreeing the big hat, and will thus compel the purchase of new ones and avoid the loss annually inflicted by ladies altering their winter hats for spring wear.

But, whilst the milliners have done a good stroke of business for themselves, they have also rendered a substantial service to their fair customers. The large hats may not be altogether becoming, but they will be materially serviceable in hot weather. They can be made to afford protection to the complexions of the wearers; they can be used as impromptu fans when the owners are heated; they will be just the things for picnics, and, indeed, a sensible and useful covering for summer. They will not obstruct the views at theatres, as the expansive winter hat did, since the theatrical season will be over.

There is but one serious drawback to them, and that is that they will be in the way at church and thus tend to discourage the young men. This can be remedied, however, in one or two ways. Either let the gentlemen all sit in the front pews, or let the churches be equally divided longitudinally between the two sexes, as was the practice in some churches twenty-five or thirty years ago, when the men sat on one side and the women on the other. The long rows of wide hats on the female side of the sacred edifice would make imposing arrays, and the worldly woman would be tormented with a burning curiosity to see the face under the big hat in front of her and debarred from seeing beyond the next row behind her. The vain could not feel that she was making a very gratifying display above all her neighbors, and the envious could not look about enough to criticise. The preacher would see long rows of pretty faces set in a variegated background, like pictures pasted upon an immense album page, and the ladies would have to look straight at the preacher since they could turn neither to the right hand or the left without disturbing the hats of all the neighbors on the same bench. For spring and summer headgear we are reconciled to the big hat. It will be such a thing for the country, the mountains or the seaside! It will keep off the sun by day and furnish an ample screen for lovers lounging in the shady nooks. Once more the girls have hit upon an acceptable, seasonable and useful fashion.
