French Anecdote of English Liberty.

In a certain cul de sac in London, the houses are propped up by beams across the street; such a convenience was irresistible to the English penchant for hanging, and in the month of November it was no uncommon thing, to see four or five gentlemen suspended side by side; this attracted the notice of the police, who stationed a sentry to put a stop to the practice; he was not long at his post before a gentleman approached, and deliberately threw his rope over the beam, and began to adjust it; the sentinel observed, 'Sir, it is not permitted to hang here.' 'How!' exclaimed the other, 'not permitted to hang! Pray, what has become of English liberty?'

ISADORE.—In the church-yard of *. There is a grave covered with a plain slab of white marble, with no other inscription than 'Isadore D'Ereillo, aged nineteen.' —These few words speak histories to the heart—they tell of a beautiful flower withered far from its accustomed soil, in the spring-day of its blossom; they tell the fate of a young and unhappy stranger, dying in a foreign country, remote from every early association, her last moments unsoothed by affectionate solicitude; no tender voice, whose lightest sound breathed happy memories; no eye of fondness on which the fainting mourner might look for sympathy; her very ashes separated from their native earth.

"Might I not fancy myself a hero of fiction?" said Colonel Fitzallan, bending gracefully as he caught the small snow-white hand which had just arranged his sling: "fair lady, henceforth I vow myself your true and loyal knight, and thus pledge my heart's first homage!" pressing the yielding fingers gently to his lips. Alas, thought Isadore, while those eloquent interpreters of the feelings, a blush, sigh and smile, mingled together; he loves not passionately as I love, or he could not trifle thus; a light compliment was never yet breathed by love. —Isadore was at that age when the deeper tenderness of woman first deepens the gaiety of childhood, like the richer tint that dyes the rose as it expands into summer loveliness. Adored by her father, for she had her mother's voice and look, and came a sweet remembrancer of his youth's sole-warm dream of happiness, of that love, whose joy departed ere it knew one cloud of care, or one sting of sorrow; a word of anger seemed to Don Fernando, a sacrilege against the dead, and his own melancholy constancy gave a reality to the romantic imaginations of his child. She now loved Fitzallan with all the fervor of first excited attachment; she had known him under circumstances most affecting, when the energies and softer feelings of woman were alike called forth; when the proud and fearless soldier became dependent on her he had protected; laid on the bed of sickness; far from the affectionate hands that would have soothed, the tender eyes that would have wept over his pillow. Isadore became his nurse, soothed with unremitting care the solitude and weariness of a sick-room: and when again able to bear the fresh air of heaven, her arm was the support of her too interesting patient. With Fitzallan the day of romance was over; a man above thirty cannot enter into the wild visions of an enthusiastic girl; flattered by the attachment which Isadore's every look betrayed, he trifled with her, regardless or thoughtless of the young and innocent heart that confided so fearlessly.—Love has no power to look forward; the delicious consciousness of the present, a faint but delightful shadow of the past, from its eternity; the possibility of separation never entered the mind of his Spanish love, till Fitzallan's instant return to England became necessary. They parted with all those gentle vows which are such sweet anchors for hope to rest on in absence—But, alas, such frail ones. For a time her English lover wrote very regularly. That philosopher knew the human heart, who said, "I would separate from my mistress for the sake of writing to her." A word, a look, may be forgotten; but a letter is a lasting memorial of affection. The correspondence soon slacked on his part. Isadore, tending the last moments of a beloved parent, had not one thought for self; but when that father's eyes were closed, and her tears had fallen on the grave of the companion of her infancy, the orphan looked round for comfort, for consolation, and felt, for the first time her loneliness and the sickness of hope deferred. Fear succeeded expectation; fear, not for his fidelity, but for his safety. Was he again laid on the bed of sickness, and Isadore far away? She dwelt on this idea till it became a present reality; suspense was agony. At length she resolved on visiting England. She sailed, and after a quick voyage, reached the land; a wanderer, seeking for happiness, which, like the shadow thrown by the lily on the water, still eludes the grasp. It was not thus in the groves of Arragon, she looked forward to the British shore; it was then the promised home of a beloved and happy bride.

The day after her arrival in London she drove to her agent's, (for her father during the troubles in Spain, had secured some property in the English funds) hoping from him to gain some intelligence of the Colonel. —Passing through a very crowded street, her coach becoming entangled in the press, occasioned a short stoppage. Gazing round in that mood, when anxious to escape the impressions within, the eye involuntarily seeks for others without, her attention became attracted by an elegant equipage.—Could she be mistaken? Never in that form—it was surely Fitzallan! Well she remembered that graceful bend, that air of protection with which he supported his companion. The agitated Spaniard just caught a glimpse of her slight and delicate figure, of eyes blue as a spring sky, of a cheek of sunset; and ere her surprise allowed the power of movement, the carriage was out of sight. Her entreaties to be allowed to alight, being only attributed to fear, were answered by assurances that she
