POETRY.

THE BOLD LOVER. For years I ador'd thee, But hope had I none, That e'er thy proud father Would brook such a son. If my hand sent no token, My lip made no sign, To picture my passion, The fault was not mine.

I've watch'd thee unwearied, In greenwood and hall, Unseen by thy kindred, Thy wooers and all-Though men cried, a marvel! I worshiped thee, where The knees of the holy Were bended in prayer.

I've looked to thy window In stillness of night, And longed for the wings Of the happy moon-light. It flew to thy chamber, And slept on thy brow, Entranced by thy beauty, As I, sweet, am now.]

In secret I burned For moment like this, To know if my portion Be torture or bliss. 'Tis speaking a word, and Our meeting is o'er-'Tis speaking a word, and We part never more.

To win thy gray father, I've no patch of earth, To match thy high brothers, I've no musty birth. Let the rich call me beggar, The titled a churl-My blade is as true as The sword of an earl.

Thou shalt not lack honor, Thou shalt not need land, While there's wit in this head, Or strength in this hand. And better than jewels, Or old pedigree, Sole queen of my bosom, Enthroned thou shait be-

My steed grows impatient, And paws at the gate, He frets for bright moments That fly as we wait. He tells me, ere morning, Far, far 1 must ride, To lead to the altar A fugitive bride.
