POETRY.

From the National Gazette.

THE FAIRY QUEEN.

Sometimes I dwell in the "Fairy Bell,"
As it hangs by its pensile stem;
Sometimes I keep, when the world's asleep,
A vigil long the flowers among;
Or I ride away, to meet the day,
On a blade of grass, while my eyes surpass
The glistening dew drop gem.

I bathe in the mist, and drink the dew
As it falls on the fainting flower;
I kiss the buds, and they ope anew
In field, and wood, and bower.

When Autumn's dreary winds blow chill.
No terrors they bring to me,
My castle's the frostwork by stream or rill.
With its pillars carved and its halls which thrill
To my song of blithesome glee.

The courser bounds across the plain,
And leaves his hoof prints there,
And it forms a lake of the drops of rain,
Where I spread my gossamer sail to the air:
Away I go, without fear or sigh,
For who is so happy then as I!

When Boreas covers its surface bright,
With a brittle and glassy shell,
Which rests as thin as the ray of light
That morn first throws o'er the gloom of night—
On my tiny crescent well:
Then I skate away, like a gleam of thought,
In the rainbow realms of fancy caught.

I cross and recross my little lake,
And then glide to the wood away,
And rest on the leaf of the scented brake,
When I conjure some future play.

I sleep in the silken tress that clings
To the stately maize's head;
The glow worm's lamp I fan with my wings,
And I dance full oft on the yielding strings
Of harps, whose sweet sounds shed
In soft mysterious cadence fall
On the ear in the depth of night,
And softly play, through chamber and hall
Bringing dreams of joy and delight to all
As I speed my onward flight.
