Correspondence of the N. Y. Courier.

MONTPELIER, Vt. Oct. 10, 1839.

The Vermont Legislature assembled this morning at 10 o'clock. The test of the House was the election of the Speaker; which is the first business after the House is called to order.

The members elect are 231; absent 4
Whole number of votes for Speaker, 227.
The result of the ballot was for

Carlos Coolidge, of Windsor, (W)	116
Paul Dillingham, (L. F.)	109

Whig majority. 7

In the Senate there are 18 Whigs to 12 Loco Focos. Whig majority 6.

The ascertained majority for Gov. Jenison. (Whig) and other State officers, is 2351; a sufficiently large majority for all useful purposes.

For the Easton Gazette.

You may have heard, Mr. Editor, that I have been charged by nearly the entire community of our district, with the authorship of "Corn Planter.' At all events the thing is so often repeated in my hearing that it has become an annoyance, and in duty to myself I will take advantage of your columns, with your consent, to flatly deny that I am "Corn-planter" or that I know any thing of him personally.

I do not take this pains, or solicit your indulgence, because I think it is a matter of any account with the community at large, whether I am, or any other individual in particular is, the author in question; but because I perceive the propensity of some of your most sagacious readers, to ascribe all the original matter that may grace or disgrace your columns to me, is likely to do me some injury. It certainly implies a compliment to be supposed capable of producing the abundance with which you, from time to time regale the public, but at the same time it must be considered a misfortune to have the credit of a head so prolific as to be able to give birth to the various communications you receive. The "cacoethes scribendi" is a malady, with which, I confess, I was somewhat afflicted a few years ago, ere the frivolities of youth had ceased to be pleasant, and when in order to try my pen, the merits of which I had not exactly ascertained, I wrote a little of every thing, alike regardless of the character I might assail or the feelings I might offend. With youth, however, the malady has passed off, and I would now certainly prefer total obscurity, to the unenviable distinction the public is disposed to accord to me, as the scribbler of all manner of scandal.

In saying this I do not wish to be understood as saying any thing of either the merits or demerits of "Corn-planter." Whilst he is aiming to inflict a kind of cat-o-ninetail castigation upon his political adversaries, he is, doubtless, preparing a delicious mouthful precisely to the taste of some of his friends. He may console himself with the fact that he is doing both; but for my own part, I will desist, as I have done, both from the one and the other. In political principles, nevertheless, I am uncompromising. To be any thing more or less than the supporter of Mr. Clay, or to fail to second any measure that will tend to his elevation to the Presidency, I should be unfaithful to my honest and solemn convictions of my duty. But these principles are the result of calm and deliberate reflection, uninfluenced by, and unconnected with any party consideration whatever. Being matters of opinion, it is possible they may be incorrect, and in admitting this, should they be so, I must crave the indulgence from those who differ with me, which I am ever ready to extend to them.

But the tattle of our neighborhood is not the only plan devised to annoy me. Some honest wight in the plenitude of his admiration of Mr. Lloyd, or of his ire against me, has taken pen in hand to epistlize a little on the occasion. He purports to write to Mr. Sherwood of the Whig; but modestly presuming that his literary merits would not be sufficient in the estimation of that gentleman, to secure a place in his paper, he declines sending it to him and instead thereof, endorses it to me. By way of a sample of this graphic and grandiloquent effort, I will give you an extract or two.

"Mr. Sherod, You bees auditer of the Wig, and Mr. Grayam bees auditer of the Gaseetiee—wen i woos lockin over him last Saturday Evenin i comes across a peace that stiled himself Corn-planter And in that peace you may sea that his abject woos to slander (as he thought) the Y house. The first letter of this word is formed precisely after the fashion of a capitial L, but in charity to the writer I presume he meant h.

"I did think wen i began that i wood treat the letter quite different to what i now intend."

Is it possible!!!

"The comet and the y house"—here is the L again—"bouth as alnos stould hy in the community, it is well none that they have aloos acted the pore man's frends" and never has yit expressed a desire to be wosshipt fer it yit."

My humane perseeuter certainly can not mean that the "call" alluded to by Cornplanter, and the "house" have been his friends. He must mean the Messrs. Lloyd, and for the kindness of those gentlemen to him I am glad, and at the same time, surprised, to hear he is grateful.

And then he proceeds to describe me as a man of "stout statute" &c. &c.

I should be happy to give you the letter entire, sir, but its length precludes the possibility. It is one of the most perfect pieces of curiosity in epistolery composition I have met with during my residence in the County. Suffice it, here, to say that it is a tissue of the vilest billingsgate aimed at me.

I think my correspondent, sir, is becoming a little smitten with the "cacoethes," and the remarks of Cornplanter upon his friends at Wye house, have provoked a sudden developement of the disease in its most malignant form. The same sage individual, as can be ascertained by the identity of hand-writing and orthography, was at some pains, a few months since, to pen a letter to a worthy citizen of St. Michael's, admonishing him of certain improprieties the said citizen was supposed to perpetrate in the way of business. In this letter a strong religious feeling is manifested and scripture quoted by the chapter to sustain the position he took. Now in the communication intended for Mr. Sherwood, he branches out as a vituperative partizan, blazing away at all who are so unfortunate as to differ with him with the stern indignation and sturdy wrath which markes the career of his great Demi-God, Thomas H. Benton From him he has, doubtless, taken his political cue, and in both his religious and party character he can, at least, boast of consistency,—in the former he is a hypocritical zealot, without understanding the first injunction of the Gospel 'Do unto others as thou wouldst have others do unto thee"—in the latter he is a malicious and unqualified blackguard and a fool.

M. SPENCER.

Beverly, Oct. 14th.

P. S. If Corn-Planter be not a resident of the Bay side, I would respectfully submit whether it is fair to falsely locate the paternity of his pieces.

RANDOM SHOT, No. 15.

But now no more must I her beauties view
Yet tremble at the thoughts to leave her too.
Pomfret.

That sweet poet (whose simple strains are so little heeded) in this couplet, meant to express the result of a contest, by which man gains the ascendancy over himself. The language of the bard admirably describes the sort of triumph, which the powers of the intellect, in an equal struggle, usually obtain over the strength of passion. It is a triumph, in which the conqueror feels insecure of his success: in which it is difficult to determine whether he feels more sympathy with his fallen foe and regret at his prostration; or alarm at the probability of future defeat. Diffident of the possibility of maintaining the ascendancy, and hardly desiring it if possible, he trembles at the perplexing and uncertain conflict in which he has yet to engage.

The desires of our nature imperiously demand no small share of present enjoyment. And when no impassable barrier opposes, we are prone enough to indulge them. Nor, is of much avail the consideration, that a temporary sacrifice of appetite will be rewarded by a larger gratification in the time to come. Voluntarily to let go the means of rendering comfortable the present hour for any advantage that may be hereafter obtained is too much like throwing ourselves into the chasm of a dark and dreary abyss, in hopes of finding the bottom soft and safe. We feel an irrepressible conviction that our original destiny was to happiness: hence the fretfulness and impatience with which we brook any interruption to the comforts of life.

It is true, but humiliating reflection to the arrogance of human virtue, that it requires the aid of favorable circumstances to carry its least, as well as, its greatest purposes into effect. Its highest resolves would become faint and ineffectual, unless they were impelled onward by the force of a current, which they neither could have set in motion, nor can they now restrain.

The events of Providence, both infinitely above their skill, and beyond their control, are the indispensable allies of virtue, without which it would ever be the easy prey of vice.

It is not that we really would not, even when we think we would not; it is only because we cannot, that we do not, when temptation presents itself, prove recreant to our virtuous promises.

We are fully satisfied of man's incompetency, without supernatural support, to sustain a character of virtue. In order therefore to render of any service the suggestions of philosophy, he must previously look with the eye of faith to an influence which descends only from on high. Possessed of this lever, in the use of which nothing required is impracticable—no stone is too ponderous to be lifted out of the way, he may tax his understanding and his memory for facilities with which to employ it more easily.—The eye must not be permitted to dwell upon an object, the tendency of which is to lead the heart astray. As it is the great medium through which we are chiefly conversant with the innumerable objects around us, whatever would approach to injure us, we must steadily exclude, by keeping that medium closed against its entrance. For whenever we allow ourselves to parley with an enemy, who possesses the means of ministering to our pleasures, there is little hope, but we shall fall into his hands.

Note—In No. 13, the last word of 1st paragraph, for "pugulists" read pugilists.

MORUS MULTICAULIS.—According to the New York correspondent of the United States Gazette, there was a sale of Morus Multicaulis trees upon Long Island on Saturday The small ones brought 17 a 23 cents, the large ones 25 a 33 cents, some branched trees from the roots sold at 50 a 55 cents. Alpines and Elatas brought 17 a 25 cents. The time will come when the Alpines will sell better than any others in this country. They will stand the climate when all others fail, and though they do not grow so rapidly as the Multicaulis yet their leaves are larger and much heavier. The number of trees sold was about 200,000, for which over $50,000 were received.

SILK CULTURE IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The ship Lausanne, now about sailing from New York with Missionaries to the Sandwich Islands, takes out a large number of trees, of the morus multicaulis, for the purpose of forming plantations there.

The National Intelligencer says, that a convention to promote the cultivation and manufacture of Silk is to be held in Washington on the 10th Dec. next, at which it is expected that there will be an attendance of delegates from every Congressional district in the union, and that arrangements are being made to accommodate 1000 delegates—It is suggested that distant states and territories appoint their Congressional representatives as delegates to the convention—also that the various silk companies immediately appoint their delegates, and announce their names in the agricultural or silk papers, and forward a copy of the paper to the Society at Washington, so that a correct list of the delegates may be made in anticipation of the Convention meeting.

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF THE TOWN OF AIKEN, SOUTH CAROLINA.—On the 4th instant a fire occurred in the store of Messrs. L. Jones & Co. in the town of Aiken, S. C. and spread with such rapidity that no less than fifty stores, dwellings and out buildings were totally destroyed in the short space of two hours. The buildings were all of wood, and as no rain had fallen for some time previous, they burnt very rapidly. The loss of property and merchandise is estimated at about seventy thousand dollars, on which there is insurance to the amount of about fifteen thousand dollars. The fire was the result of the carelessness of a clerk.

It is stated in a letter published in the Charleston Courier, that the business men of the town had determined to rebuild their houses, and that on the same day of the fire all the cotton brought to town for sale had been promptly purchased. With such spirit and enterprise it is hoped the evil will soon be repaired.

THE ENGLISH MARKET.

There is no longer any doubt that the English Harvest has been a failure. The weather had been so long unfavorable that there was scarcely a possibility of an average crop.

FLORIDA—THE PEACE.—Since Gen. Macomb, about the first of May, announced "the war ended," the Indians have killed FORTY-SIX citizens and soldiers—destroyed a vast amount of property—and kept the whole Territory in a turmoil.
