POETRY.

THE DREAMER.

I dream the only happiness I know.
MRS. BUTLER.

One year ago my heart, like thine sweet friend,
Thrilled to the music of the rustling leaves,
And loved all gentle harmonies that blend
In one low chorus, when the bosom heaves
With long drawn sighs of tremulous delight,
As slowly fades the day to deeper night.

And I have sat as now in this lone wood,
At twilight hour to commune with my heart.
All wilder thoughts at rest, a dreamy mood
Stole o'er my spirit; sorrow had no part
In those still musings, but to breathe, to live,
Did such exceeding pleasure to me give.

One little year! Oh, heart, thy throbbing cease!
How much of life was crowded in its span!
My daily paths were pleasantness, and peace.
When with swift round this circling year began,
But now a shadow rests on earth and sky;
Day after day still passes wearily.

I meant not to complain for I have learned
In life each hath a sorrow to conceal.
I would but tell thee that from earth I turned:
I may not even to my friend reveal
Why one who is a very child in years,
Hath drunk so deeply at the fount of tears.

Thank God for gentle sleep! I close mine eyes,
And though all fevered fancies round me throng—
Though doubts that almost madden will arise—
She has a power more subtle and more strong;
Her soothing hand is on my forehead pressed;
Then comes forgetfulness, and I am blessed.

Forgetfulness of care—for oh, I move
In happier worlds, and live a purer life;
Scorn may not enter there, nor envy prove
Discord to melody—unholy strife
Afar is banished—joy's unclouded beams
Ever illumine that fair land of dreams.

Then wonder not I seek this forest dell,
Although mine ears are closed to nature's voice;
A hush, at twilight 'neath the branches dwell;
So I have made the summer woods my choice.
And sleeping with the shadows through the day,
Forget the world, and dream my life away.

READING THE WILL.

BY MRS. ABDY.

This morning I received a note from my affianced bride, Constance Graham, requesting me to attend at two o'clock that day at the house of her late uncle at Marley street, for the purpose of hearing his will read. I had the greatest pleasure in complying with this invitation. I had really begun to fancy that old Mr. Graham was going to remain perpetually on earth, like Mrs. Norton's 'Undying One;' he was always on the point of death, and always cured, and better than ever in the course of a few days; last month the cold water system seemed completely to renovate him, but he suddenly replased, departed from the world, and left fifty thousand pounds and a will behind him. Though Constance is the prettiest and most amiable girl of my acquaintance, I had determined never to marry her while her uncle lived; he had frequently proclaimed her his heiress, but as frequently took offence at something or at nothing in her behaviour, and bequeathed his wealth to a hospital, prison, or lunatic asylum. I felt quite easy on the present occasion, for Mrs. Bate, Mr. Graham's house-keeper, had given me information that, only an hour before her master's death, he told her he had handsomely provided for Constance. I felt, however, that it was my policy to appear ignorant of that circumstance, Constance being very romantic, and Constance's mother very suspicious.

At the appointed time I walked into the drawing room in Marley street; the very few relatives of the old gentleman were assembled. There was Constance, looking as Hebe might have looked if Hebe had ever worn crape and bombazine; Constance's mother, looking stiff, cross and uneasy; an elderly female cousin, and stripling nephew of the deceased. I feared none of them. I knew that Mr. Graham disliked his fine lady sister-inlaw, despised the servility of his elderly cousin and dreaded the frolics of his stripling nephew. I seated myself by Constance, and in a soft tone began to protest my affection and disinterestedness. 'Knowing the caprice of your uncle, my beloved,' I said, 'I have every reason to conclude that I shall hear that you are disinherited; this, however, will be of little moment to me; I have enough for comfort, though not for luxury, and, as the song beautifully says—

'Still fixed in my heart be it never forgot
That the wealth of the cottage is love.' "

"I fancy, Mr. Clifton," said Constance's mother, looking excessively sneerish and shrewish, "that it is pretty well known that my daughter is the sole heiress of her uncle's wealth."

"Indeed, madam!" I replied, with a start of surprise, "I was not aware that any surmise was hazarded concerning the contents of Mr. Graham's will."

"I have heard a surmise hazarded," sharply interposed the elderly cousin, "that Mr. Graham was not in his senses when he made it."

"The mind must be both base and weak," retorted Constance's mother, "which could give credence to such a rumor." And forthwith a sparing dialogue took place between the two ladies, during which I whispered to Constance a page of Moore's poetry done into prose.

Temple now entered the room, the solicitor and intimate friend of the late Mr. Graham; he was a handsome young man, and had presumed at one time to lift his eyes to Constance; he opened the will and we all became mutely attentive. Oh, what a disappointment awaited us! Three thousand pounds were bequeathed to Constance, (this was the old fellow's idea of a handsome provision!) Five hundred pounds to the elderly cousin, ditto to the stripling nephew, small legacies to the servants, and the remainder of his wealth to found a cold water establishment for the reception of those who were not rich enough to pay a gratuity for being half drowned.—Temple read the names of the attesting witnesses, and then refreshed himself with sherry and biscuits. As he was a friend of the family, his presence was no restraint on conversation.

"That will ought to be disputed," said Constance's mother, looking very red; "I do not believe Mr. Graham was in his senses when he made it."

"I thought," said the elderly cousin, with a sneer, "that the mind must be both base and weak which could give credence to such a surmise."

"Dear mamma!" said Constance, "do not be discomposed; I am very well contented—I shall not be quite a portionless bride." Constance here held out her delicate white hand to me—I affected not to see it.

"My dear Miss Graham," I said, "do not believe me so cruel and selfish as to wish to plunge you into poverty,"

"I thought you said that your income was sufficient for every comfort," remarked the stripling nephew.

I did not condescend to answer him, but continued: "No, though it breaks my heart to do so, I give you back your freedom, saying, in the pathetic words of Haynes Bayly, 'May your lot in life be happy, undisturbed by thoughts of me!' " I was just making for the door, leaving Constance looking more like Niobe than Hebe, when Temple said, "I think the party had better remain till I have read the codicil."

I reseated myself in amaze, and Temple forthwith read that the testator, being convinced that he had received no benefit from the cold water system, rescinded his legacy to it, bequeathing the same to his beloved niece, Constance Graham.

"Constance! dear Constance!" I exclaimed in the softest of tones. But Constance looked neither like Hebe nor Niobe, but as stern and severe as Medea. I then attacked Temple. "Is it legal," I said "only to read part of a will?"

"I read every word of the will," he replied, "and, having greatly fatigued myself by so doing, I trust that it was perfectly legal to refresh myself with a glass of sherry before I read the codicil."

I was going to utter some further remarks, when Constance's mother said, "Good morning, Mr. Clifton!" in a tone of voice which left me no alternative but to echo her leave taking, and I descended the stairs,—pursued by a smothering laugh from the party in the drawing room, returned home in very low spirits, and entered my adventure or rather my misadventure in my diary, deducing from it this valuable piece of advice to gentlemen in search of fortune: "Never believe that a will is concluded till you have inquired whether there is any codicil to it.—Sharpe's Magazine.

A YANKEE PREACHER'S NOTICE.

"I beg the audience to be seated a moment. Rumor has come to my ears, that a large quid of tobacco was dropped into the contribution box last Sabbath. The man who committed that outrage would do well to pause in his career. He is slipping down a greased plank to perdition—To-night there will be a preaching in most of the churches. The public gardens, I am desired to give notice, are also open On Tuesday night there will be a fire, Providence permitting. On Thursday evening the gates of the battery will be thrown open for the reception of strollers and ardent lovers. There will be a Distracted Meeting held at Tammany Hall on Saturday evening, to commence at early candle lighting. Admission gratis; on going out a shilling will be received by a keeper at the door, for the benefit of the Manual Labor Society for the Education of Indolent Young Men for the A. B. F. Mission at Nootka Sound——I would observe that one Miller is preaching up the doctrine that the world is to be destroyed in 1848; but don't you believe it. The earth is just as good as new; and will last for a hundred years yet, at the least calculation—Those persons were are in the habit of coming late to church, taking advantage of the proverb, 'better late than never,' would confer a particular favor upon me, and the audience generally, if they would wear pumps. The clanking of the iron-heeled boots does not accord with the place, and it also disturbs those who may be taking a comfortable snooze at the time——My friends are particularly requested not to hang round the doors after service is over, as it not only gives the house the appearance of a grogshop, but is extremely annoying to many ladies. It may be proper here for me to state that a part of the receipts arising from the circulation of the Sunday Morning Mercury in which my sermons are printed are appropriated to my benefit; therefore I wish you all to patronise that entertaining little paper for my sake, and your own especial good."—Glasgow Chronicle.
