never were more prosperous. But to whom are you indebted for that limited measure of success, which has continued to mark your progress? Is it not that element in your political system which disarms opposition, and pushes you onward, in spite of the mal-administration of your rulers, and the evil influences that are excited to retard it? It is this that has sustained you thus long, in defiance of those who have conspired to build their own visionary hopes upon the ruins of the national prosperity.

The committee have felt constrained to refer thus briefly to some of the leading events in the progress of the dominant party, because of their unprecedented and extraordinary character, and the necessity which they impose for prompt and vigorous action on the part of the Whig voters through out the Union. The distracted condition of our affairs calls for united action, and in the exercise of the sovereign franchise which the constitution has left in our hands we must look with a single eye to the vital issues involved. You are invoked by every consideration of public policy, to move in concert an harmony. If we would place beyond contingency the cherished principles on whose adamantine base we have been so long impregnable, we must act together, without alienation, and with a common motive.

It need hardly be affirmed, as a consequence of the multiplied abuses to which we have referred that the numerical strength of the Whig party was never greater than at the present moment. New allies are flocking to your standard. Public demonstrations in every part of the Union, have inspired us with renewed confidence in the success of those principles which have become so largely identified with whatever is valuable in the past history of your Government. They must go on to prosper, and it is not difficult to forsee, that by judicious and well directed efforts the ascendancy of the Whig party may be secured and the country rescued from the disordered condition into which it has fallen.

Among the distinguished men, fellow citizens, to whom the public attention has been directed, as most likely to check this current of Executive misrule, and bring back the Goverment to its original purity, it would be difficult for this committee to undertake to discriminate. Where all are alike conspicuous, and entitled to confidence and applause of their fellow citizens it were needless to indulge in individual preferences.

The public manifestations in many parts of the State of Maryland, have pointed to that successful leader, who within the last few months, has occupied so large a space in the public eye. No man connected with our previous history, has furnished a more striking example, than is presented to us in the character of ZACHARY TAYLOR. He entered the Mexican campaign a comparatively obscure man, and a few months have placed him among the most prominent and successful, in the annals of military renown. But it is not in his military sphere alone that recent events have made him conspicuous. In all the substantial elements of true merit—in sound discrimination—in a just knowledge of mankind—in practical wisdom—in unaffected virtue and benevolence of character, he has attained a rank which few men have reached, and which entitles him to the confidence and support of the American people.

Imbibing his political creed as he has himself informed us, from the early fathers of our Republic—he has given his sanction to the principles which have governed the Whig party. There can be no better comment upon the soundness and purity of those principles, than the countenance and support of such a man, who has heretofore stood aloof from the strife of party, and kept himself free from its controlling influence.

But, fellow-citizens, while you would indulge the expression of an opinion, which you may entertain in common with a large portion of the Whig voters throughout the country, it should not be forgotten that there are other and not less prominent names, which are likely to engage the attention of the people in the coming contest. While it should be our policy to exclude none, it is our duty to concentrate upon that which is most like to command the public confidence and support.

It has been the grateful task of your committees on previous occasions, to recommend to the suffrages of the Whig voters of the State of Maryland, that distinguished citizen whose recent appearance among us has kindled anew the embers of popular enthusiasm, and whose achievments are too brilliant to be forgotton by the party with which he has been so long associated. Of HENRY CLAY it would be difficult for this committee to speak in terms of too great admiration. Entering the public council at an early period of our history, his name is connected with every prominent event of the last half century. The united gratitude of the whole people, manifested in whatever form, could offer but inadequate return for his generous & patriotic sacrifices. The Whig party have always delighted to do him honor. They have shared the glory of his great name, & they can never withhold from him that measure of applause which he has so nobly won by a life devoted to the public service.

Alike prominent among his friends and true to the principles of the Whig party, is that gallant and war-worn veteran, who, after a series of the most brilliant and astounding victories which history has been called to record, has been struck down by the executive caprice, in the very midst of the army which he had conducted in safety, through so many perils and dangers, to the long wished-for Halls of the Montezumas. The past history of WINFIELD SCOTT is a record of patriotic devotion. His whole life has been spent in the public service. The firm and uncompromising advocate of Whig principles, he has become the victim of a relentless persecution; but his fame is destined to live beyond the calumnies of those who would detract from the hard-earned reputation which he has won on so many fields of glory.

In view, then, fellow-citizens, of the distracting claims, which are likely to arise—all entitled to the gravest and most serious consideration, it becomes the Whig voters of the State of Maryland to keep an eye to their organization, and in whatever situation they may find themselves placed, to recollect that they are all members of the same party—standing upon a common platform, and having common interests to subserve. If success attend our efforts, it can only result from harmony and concert.

The Representatives of the Whig party in the Legislature of our own State, responding to the recommendation of our Whig brethren at the seat of the General Government, and in other States of the Union, have declared the expediency of a National Convention. This measure has been suggested by the importance of preserving the integrity of our party, in order that we may enter the contest with the decided advantage which a united organization must give us. With the various interests that are known to exist, it would be impossible to move, with any hope of success, without the interposition of a National Convention, whose decision shall have the effect of presenting the Whig vote in its unbroken strength, upon whatever candidate shall be deemed most suitable, after a calm and dispassionate review of his merits and availability. Such a Convention, constituted as it will be, representing the voice of the people in their primary assemblies, cannot fail to respond to the wishes of the majority of the Whig voters of this Union.

Where the leading object is reform, and the enforcement of principles which are believed to be vital to the prosperity of the government, the members of such a Convention can countenance no individual preferences, which are not in harmony with their duty as members of the Whig party. Whoever is most likely to ensure success, it will be the duty no less than the inclination of such a body, to recommend to the suffrages of the American people. It would be difficult, without the most serious consequences, to supercede at this late day, a usage which has become a part of the organization of the Whig party. If we distrust the action of a National Convention, as likely to defeat the clearly expressed indications of public sentiment, with how much more reason should we avoid the universal confusion which must ensue from an absence of all party concert? Where there are numerous favorites, claiming the support of large and important interests, it is not possible that all can be equally successful; and without that free interchange of opinion, in estimating the strength and availability of each, with a view to compromise, and submission to the will of the majority, it is useless to hope for results, which the united strength of the Whig party, and this alone, will enable us to accomplish.

Public meetings in some parts of our State have looked to new and independent organizations, with a view to the nomination of General Taylor, without distinction of party, and without reference to the action of a National Convention. As the nominee of a Convention, it seems to be conceded that his election would be certain; but as an independent candidate, without such endorsement, it cannot be doubted that his success would be utterly hopeless. How far, then, such demonstrations are calculated to advance the objects intended to be subserved, is matter for grave consideration, with that portion of our Whig brethren, who have given them their countenance and support. If it be conceded, that Gen. Taylor can only succeed, as the choice of a Convention, is it not the policy of those who desire his nomination, to unite in a fair and proper constitution of that body? A refusal on the part of his friends to participate in the proceedings of such Convention can have no other effect than to increase the strength of other and perhaps less available candidates.

Such a party, constituted with a view to independent action, while it might contribute to the defeat of his denomination as the choice of the Convention, would be powerless as to any salutary influence which they could hope to exercise in such an emergency. They would occupy an anomalous position, between the two great parties, with the power perhaps to defeat the wishes of that with whom they have heretofore acted, and with whose principles they are identified, but with no power to control the independent action of either. The auxilary Democratic aid, which is expected to be controlled, by an independent organization, can hardly be realized to an extent, which would justify the lasting injury which must be inflicted upon the Whig party. The Democratic supporters of General Taylor require no conciliation at our hands. Such a combination may eventually wean us from our party obligations and attachments, but it could not control one cardinal principle of their political organization, or contribute to those necessary and salutary reforms in the administration of the General Government which are so loudly called for by the melancholy condition of our public affairs.

It becomes, then, the solemn duty of this Committee to urge upon the Whig party of the State of Maryland, the absolute necessity of an adherence to their existing organization. Whatever may be the nomination of a National Convention, it is our duty to lay aside individual preferences, and look to the great object to be accomplished. We have paramount duties to discharge, and no man can disregard those duties who would be true to himself, and those great principles of public policy, which have so often heretofore contributed to the prosperity and renown of our common country. The achievements of the Whig party glitter upon every page of your public history. The battles that have been fought under that glorious banner, have been the battles of your constitution—a strife for equality and a just and proper understanding of the true Democratic principles, on which your institutions are based. That banner has not been always triumphant amid the storms of political excitement; but it must ever be, now and hereafter, the rallying point of the friends of constitutional government; and we call upon you, Whigs of the State of Maryland, to come together once more, under its broad folds, and to buckle on your armor for a contest, which involves so much of weal or wo, to our common interests.

EASTON ACADEMY.

MR. EDITOR:—Although a notice of the Examination and Exhibition at the Academy may now appear late, yet as no earlier opportunity presented itself, and as you will doubtless agree with the writer that they ought not to be passed over in silence, no apology is deemed necessary for requesting your insertion of the following in your next paper, unless something in your opinion more appropriate, should be offered in the mean time.

Gratifying as such occasions always are to those who are interested in the cause of education, I have seldom, if ever, been so much pleased as by the thorough and searching examination of the students of our Academy on the 23d ult, and by the exercises in declamation on the evening of the following day. It must have been evident to the most casual observer, that there was no preparation for external show, without corresponding substance; every thing gave proof of the most thorough and careful training, such as would do credit to any Institution of learning—The prepared specimens of penmanship; the copy books of the pupils; the maps; the astronomical diagrams; the exercises in orthography, both oral and written; the distinct, clear and correct enunciation, and in many instances, the feeling displayed, in reading; the precision of translation and analysis both of Latin and Greek; the prompt and intelligent answers in Geometry and Astronomy, all proved that the present principal of the Institution is in all points, complete master of his profession; and I could not but feel proud to have among us an establishment for youth so conducted.

Nor did the young gentlemen acquit themselves less to their own credit and that of their Instructor, in the declamatory exercises;—indeed, not a few of the pieces were spoken in a manner difficult to be surpassed, both as regarded chasteness and propriety of gesture, and correctness and pathos of elocution. I send you a programme of these exercises, which I retained; and conclude by expressing the hope that the Easton Academy may long remain under its present efficient management.
