WORTH QUOTING

Papa, says the man who is fond of digging up things, may be comparatively a newcomer into the English language, but it is as old as Homer. Nausicaa, in the "Odyssey," called her father "papa phile" dear papa. Oh, yes, suppose they had 'em even in those days. Now, take another peek at the "Odyssey" and see if "Everybody Works but Father" isn't there, says the ribald New York Telegram.

The world never forgets the good citizen. The world immediately forgets the man of money only. Go through our "Who's Who in America," and other books of men of mark, exclaims the Denver News, and not one-tenth of one per cent. of those registered as worthy of having their names printed there are men who are known for their money.

The American dairy and stock farmer can make a fortune in Panama, according to a report from Consul Kellogg. Watered milk is sold at 30 cents a quart and poor meat at 25 cents a pound. Cattle are protected by a tariff of $10 a head on steers and $8 on cows. The United States government, however, being exempt in importing for purely canal purposes.

A large district in the middle of Porto Rico, with a population of 100,000 is afflicted with "the lazy worm," and official efforts are being made to improve the inhabitants' condition. A hospital has been established at Albonito, with an endowment of $15,000 and will do what it can to check the ravages of this minute reptile, of the existence of which the old time native Porto Rican never had the slightest notion. Last year an American medical officer, Captain Ashford, treated 4,500 cases, and nearly all of them were cured. As a result, the population are aroused to much enthusiasm, and the afflicted are applying in great numbers for treatment. Heretofore the malady has been deemed incurable.

We heard a young man remark last week that, "The world owes me a living." It is hoped for that young man's good that he'll get the notion out of his head. It's a mistake, a grave mistake, asserts the Florida Agriculturist. He never entertained a more foolish idea nor one which will bring him a smaller measure of respect. The world owes the young man nothing; but instead he owes the world and society an active, noble manhood, a steady, honest energy which will enable him to associate with decent men and women in a true manliness of character that will make his friendship valuable and his presence and companionship desired. The truly intelligent activity, and this young man should contribute to society's happiness and welfare the grace which comes through study, toil and honest thought.

There could be no greater mistake than for Moslems to infer from Emperor William's refusal to be left out of the plan arranged by France and England for the disposal of Morocco that he would afford support, direct or indirect, to outbreaks against Christians in Algeria and Egypt. All that France and England would need to do to secure his zealous co-operation in resistance to a Jehad, asserts Harper's Weekly, would be to concede to him ascendency in the Euphrates Valley, the exploitation of which is already contemplated by a German railway company. A Moslem Holy War in the twentieth century would be a glaring anarchonism, which might cause much bloodshed for a while, but which, in the end, would bring the authors and abettors of it to destruction.

Times and manners change. The customs of London, ancient and modern, greatly differ. Says "The London Times" regarding mediaeval days: "Dancing was a passion with everybody. From the Queen to the milkmaid, all the women danced; from the King to the craftsman, all of the young men danced. They danced in the streets whenever it was possible, which was one of the reasons why May Day was so joyous a festival. The more courtly people had dances dignified and stately, such as the Danse au Virlet, in which each performer sang a verse, and then they all danced around, singing the same verse in chorus; the Pas de Brahant, where every man knelt to his partner; the Danse au Chapelet, where every man kissed his partner; they danced together, singing minstrel's songs; they danced in the garden, they danced in the meadow, they went out at night to dance, with tapers in their hands; they danced to beautiful music played by an orchestra. Where is the dancing spirit now? Where the mixed kissing? When did Merry England die? When did it begin? Was it ever so?

ANTIFERMENTS IN DIGESTION.

Why the Intestines Do Not Digest Themselves.

The digestive tube is filled with ferments capable of attacking, of destroying, and of transforming the food with which they come in contact, but these ferments attack neither the walls of the intestine nor the parasites which often live in abundance on these walls. What causes this condition? The question has often been discussed and now the researches of M. E. Weinland on the tryptic ferment again bring the matter forward.

In 1891 Frenzel stated that he believed the protection enjoyed by the intestines was due to the antiferments which are secreted by living tissues. An experiment of M. Weinland along this line is very interesting. A mixture was made of fibrine and of trypsine or of pepsin, and the whole was placed to digest after a little juice of ascaris was added. No digestion occurred. The experiment may be prolonged indefinitely, but the ferment does not attack the fibrine when the antiferment is present. Thus it is not the living tissues which resists digestion, but the juices which impregnate them and which they secrete.

This antiferment extract is very powerful and remains active for months. It loses its property by boiling, but heating to 60 degrees C. for ten minutes does not affect it, although heating to 80 degrees C. for the same time greatly diminishes its antidigestive action. By the nature of the active substance it can only be characterized by the effect produced, which is an inhibitory action on digestive ferments. The antiferment may, however, be precipitated by alcohol, or rather there is precipitated a substance which has the antiferment action and is not digestible by trypsine or pepsin. If the ferment and the antiferment be placed together they do not mutually destroy each other, but merely inhibit the action the one of the other.

On a wager of $20, Joe Montana, an Italian gardener, at Whlla Walla, Wash., recently carried a 100-pound sack of sugar from a produce warehouse to a ranch three miles west of the city and back, without setting down his burden. The feat was accomplished in one hour and three-quarters.

Unlucky Emblems.

The Parisian has an idea that when lucky charms fail unlucky ones may succeed. Thus she seeks eagerly after various curious little emblems, such as these: A peacock's tail feathers in enamel, a little bunch of green ribbons, a tiny pair of crossed knives suspended from a ring, a round tablet of gold bearing the number 13, a cracked mirror charm, or a single eye—presumably an evil one—painted upon a plaque, says Woman's Life. These are supposed to bring good luck when the usual lucky ones fail, just as the number 13 and the opal are claimed as individual luck bringers by certain English believers in their power for good.

GIRL KILLS CINNAMON BEAR.

Miss Bertha Jones, a recent arrival in the Entiat Valley, is said to have celebrated her coming by shooting and killing a 1000 pound cinnamon bear, one of the largest ever seen in that section.

Miss Jones, who lives in Walla Walla, went to Entiat to join her brother, who is prospecting Muddy Creek. Last Friday morning, her brother being absent, Miss Jones left camp for a few minutes for water. On her return she found a bear inside the tent investigating and bolting everything eatable in sight. A .3030 rifle was close at hand. Miss Jones killed the intruder at the first shot.—Spokane Chronicle.
