that it made an impression upon her mind, from the fact that she could not pay it to the stores in Frederick and buy little things that she might want in the house; and what impressed it upon my mind was the fact of one ten dollar bill that she kept in her pocket-book, and was there at the time of her death, and I sold it afterwards at a depreciation of 25 cents on the dollar; that note was an Indiana note.

Fifth cross-interrogatory. Do you think that is an answer to my question as to how you knew that a majority of this money was of the banks you referred to?

5X answer. I do, from the fact as fully stated, that my wife had a difficulty in getting rid of other moneys, besides the note so described.

Sixth cross-interrogatory. Do you mean to swear from any positive knowledge of yours that a majority of the notes were such as you described them, or is it a mere impression that you have drawn from the circumstances you have narrated?

6X answer. I will state more fully, that my wife and I both remarked or talked of at the time, that my impression was at the time the money was given her it looked as if it had come out of a shaving shop; that was our conversation at the time.

Seventh cross-interrogatory. You did not think then much of it, and you talked about it as if it were not very valuable: is that so?

7X answer. It was not; we thought that it was very kind in Mr. Lott Ridgely, giving her the money even at its depreciation, as she stated, as I was building at the time upon my own property, that it would enable her to get some few nicetiies for our house, and she remarked that she thought I was most too hard on Lott, as it was I, myself, had made the remark that it looked as if it had come out of a shaving shop.

Eighth cross interrogatory. It was you who made the remark about the shaving shop, and not your wife?

8X answer. Yes, sir, she coincided with me in a jocular way.

Ninth cross interrogatory. Well, you made fun of it then, both of you?

9X answer. Yes, sir.

Tenth cross interrogatory. Did I understand you to say in your examination-in-chief, that you did not have any conversation together about this money?

10X answer. I guess not.

Eleventh cross-interrogatory. Did you understand it to be a gift?

11X answer. We did, from the fact of her having never gotten anything from her grandfather prevous to that time.

Twelfth cross-interrogatory. Did you understand that it was given to her because you had not received anything previous to that time?

12X answer I dont know how to answer.

(Witness requests three times that the last two questions be read over, which being done, he asks that what he has said in answer to the last question be stricken out; the defendants object to its being stricken out.)

12X answer continued. I will merely state that she was surprised from the fact of never having received any money previous to that time; that it should have been given to her in that kind of money.

Thirteenth cross interrogatory. If it was a gift, pure and simple, and not paid to her in consideration of something that she was entitled to, why should she express her surprise
