MARYLAND WILDLIFE

Engraved by the MARYLAND GAME & INLAND FISH COMMISSION

MOURNING DOVE

(Zenaidura macroura carolinensis)

RANGE: Eastern mourning doves, or one of the two subspecies is found in every state, and throughout all Maryland.

DESCRIPTION: Length about 12 inches; long pointed tail; a grayish-brown bird with small black marks on neck; metallic reflection from sides; female smaller than male; wings "whistle" at times when in flight which is very swift. The cry of the dove is a sweet cooing call which has a mournful sound, hence the bird's name.

BREEDING: Builds crude nest mostly in low trees in Maryland, although in some sections where trees are scarce, on the ground; two or more broods a year; lays two glossy white eggs; incubation, by both sexes, about 12-14 days; pair remain mated generally throughout the year. The young are first fed on "pigeon milk" which is food partly digested by parents; there are records of doves nesting in the U. S. A. during every month of the year except January. Nests frequently in small towns and villages around houses.

HABITS: Gather in flocks in late summer and fall in Maryland, mostly young birds, and frequent corn fields and wheat stubbles; prefers water near by for drinking and bathing, and will fly long distances for it in dry regions, generally early in morning and late in evening just before going to roost. The species is migratory although many mourning doves remain in Maryland all winter.

MANAGEMENT: Some States place the dove on the protected list as is done with song birds; it is considered a game bird in Maryland and 23 other states, mostly in the south.

VALUE: Valued highly as a game bird and prized as food where hunting is permitted. Valuable as a weed seed and insect destroyer at times; much of its food is grain such as wheat, however it is mostly that which has escaped the gleaner and would be lost unless consumed by doves and other wildlife.
