

for slaps at the stores of some merchants, and in many instances, cheaper than the mail order house. They can, however, in a great number of instances be pardoned for this seeming foolishness, for they have no means of ascertaining the facts, while the advertisement of the mail order houses find their way into nearly every home newspaper and catalogue.

The business of the average merchant can be considerably augmented as can also that of any other business man who is dependent upon the public, and THE NEWS is ready to furnish undisputable evidence. It is extremely desirous of seeing a material increase made in the volume of business done in Queenstown and, as an incentive to any business house, will guarantee to make it profitable to them to use its columns.

The announcement of the death of Pope Leo XIII, on Monday, was not received with surprise, in view of his advanced age and the feeble condition of his health for sometime past.

No occupant of Peter's chair has been more really the Pope of Christians since the Reformation than the Middle Ages. His personal and priestly life, his purity of life, his kindness, his Christian faith, his devotion to the church, his generation of non-Catholics, his even of non-Christians, in hardly a lesser degree than that of the believers in the Roman Church. The reverence inspired by his great age no doubt added to this.

Above all these grounds for respecting Leo XIII, and his office, however, is the fact that the temporal power of the Pope has come to an end. As the prospects of recovering the things of this world have grown less the regard for the Pope as the spiritual head of a great Christian community has increased.

He had the intellect of a great Pontiff, but his goodness surpassed his greatness. His sympathies were as broad as humanity. An aristocrat by descent, he was a democrat by nature. He sympathized with the poor, labored for the toiling masses, believed in popular government and loved America. His kindly, simple nature was for love, peace and good.

With a broad spirit of Christianity, he was tolerant of all Christians. Well may the loss of such a man be universally mourned, when bigotry has given place and old-time religious intolerance.

It will cure the liver and the stomach. It will break down the system and cure the disease. It will cure the disease and break down the system. It will cure the disease and break down the system. It will cure the disease and break down the system.
