SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1937.

In spite of the inclement weather of Wednesday, there was a large crowd on hand to witness the second inauguration of President Roosevelt. The President enters upon his second term with great majorities in both branches of Congress for his party. Whether that is an advantage or not depends upon the future. This is a party government and two large parties are necessary to insure good government, and the closer they are in numerical strength, the better the chance of wiser administration.

The motorists of this State have willingly accepted the gas and other taxes levied against them, amounting to several million dollars annually, so long as they were used in building and maintaining the public roads. This tax was first proposed and justified on the ground that the motorist enjoyed the benefit of it. But they cannot be willing to submit to this tax and have a large portion of it diverted to other purposes. The proposition of Governor Nice to have a million or so of the income from the gas tax carried ints the treasury for other than its intended purpose will strike fear among the payers. Not only does it materrially reduce the road funds, but may be a precedent for a further raid upon it. The funds from this tax should be not used except for roads.

FACTS AND FIGURES ON YOUR TELEPHONE BY

Telephone communication is becoming more and more essential to the inauguration of the President of the United States. At the Capitol at Washington, January 20: President Roosevelt takes the oath of office, being the first president to be inaugurated under the twentieth amendment to the Constitution. In taking the oath the President's voice travels over telephone lines and radio circuits for the benefit of people in every city, town and hamlet in the United States and in many countries of the world.

Telephone Lines

Picture transmission by telephone lines to all parts of the country insures appearance of events in papers, in many cases on the same day of the ceremony. Loud speakers convey to the audience present around the Capitol and along the ceremonial march to the White House step-by-step occurrences. The inauguration, in fact, is a communications one.

Telephone communication played its first permanent part at inaugurations when the late President Warren G. Harding took the oath of office, March 4, 1921. At that time the Bell public address system made its initial appearance before a large group estimated at 100,000 people around the Capitol. When Calvin Coolidge became president, March 4, 1925, the public address system again came into use and in addition the ceremonies were broadcast from twenty-one radio stations throughout the United States, these stations being connected by telephone lines. Picture transmission by telephone lines also played an important part in this ceremony.

Picture Transmission

At the inauguration of President Hoover, March 4, 1929, the public address system, more radio stations connected by telephone lines and telephoto pictures were the features of the day.

Telephone communication speeding inauguration events is taken as a matter of course. In the case of General Washington's inauguration, even the generous time allowances were found insufficient. He was not notified of his election until April 14, following the casting of all electoral ballots on the first Wednesday in February. Leaving his home on April 16, Washington reached New York in time to be present at his inauguration on April 30, 1789.

Telephone and other electrical communications bring inaugural events to the people as they occur.

Why We Need A Balanced Budget

By RAYMOND PITCAIRN

National Chairman Sentinels of the Republic

The American people have recently heard from Washington a statement which they can greet with a wholehearted welcome.

It is the assurance that a Balanced Budget is actually in sight.

There are difficulties in the way, of course—but every citizen with the welfare of the nation at heart will hope that these will be surmounted.

Why?

Because a Balanced Budget means far more than a matter of bookkeeping routine.

It can offer to government the benefits—which every wage-earner and housewife understands—of living within its income.

It can lessen the dangers—which every farmer and business man recognizes—of mortgaging the future through reckless accumulation of debts to be paid out of earnings in the years to come.

But it can do still more.

It can bring a revival of that confidence which alone will speed up America's latent capacity for production and consumption—a primary requisite for widespread re-employment.

To Congress the job may seem a hard one But the course has been charted It demands definite steps toward economy in government—involving the paring-down of swollen political payrolls. reduction of overlapping bureaus. insistence on a dollar's worth of value for every dollar spent from public funds; and emphasis on efficiency rather than extravagance in the administration of relief

All these policies are of great value in themselves. And if a sincere adherence to them on the part of Congress can bring a Balanced Budget, their value will be multiplied.

Telephone Used for Diplomatic Service

Use of the telephone for informal discussions between twenty-one American republics was strongly advocated by Secretary of State Hull at the Inter-American Conference at Buenos Aires recently, according to the daily press. The American delegation thinks that by using the telephone when a difficulty arises, time can be gained in heading off trouble before it becomes serious.

Elaborate conciliation and arbitration machinery exists now in a network of treaties, but this machinery is so cumbersome that it takes six months to get it moving. * * * The American delegation hopes to establish the habit of using the long distance telephone for informal discussion. * * * This is an instance of the practical, human touch, which the American government is attempting to introduce into international affairs and is the first time that the telephone has been given official recognition as a diplomatic instrument.
