"Good old Bob."

Lily is now practically running Bob's life. And when Oscar (Robert Benchley) remonstrates with him, Bob orders him out of his apartment. He paints no more, debts descend on him and Lily gets on his nerves. One night he feels an urge to visit Fraum's art school. The welcome of the pupils and Oscar's proffered renewal of friendship are the first real solace he has had in weeks.

"Darling! You've really come back to me?"

Bob decides to begin life anew in his old Village haunts. Bawltitude, the art connoisseur who had discovered him, has said he will never paint again. Defying this verdict. Bob works with a vengeance and finally manages to recapture the old flame. He is in his studio one evening when he hears a noise. Turning, he sees that it is Julie, in her negligee, tiptoeing across the floor.

"So I'm through as a painter, eh?"

Bursting with happiness, Bob feels that he still has a score to settle with Bawltitude (Monte Woolley) Oscar, Julie and Bob proceed to Bawltitude's house. First frightening the man out of his wits, they haul him off to Bob's studio to view his latest picture. Bawltitude, ever the true lover of art, is so delighted with Bob's regeneration that he forgives the rough treatment he has suffered.

"We're on our way again-together, Julie."

The hilarious merry-makers, Bawltitude included, invade the sacred dignity of Fifth Avenue, doing a delirious snake dance to the wild consternation of the police force. Then, with the evening over, Julie and Bob return to their Village apartment. And as Bob kisses her and holds her tight, he realizes, overwhelmingly, that with Julie by his side, he cannot possibly ever be a failure. -THE END-
