THE ANGEL'S BIDDING.

Not a sound is heard in the Convent;
The Vesper Chant is sung,
The sick have all been tended,
The poor men's toils are ended
Till the matin bell has rung.
All is still, save the clock, that is ticking
So loud in the frosty air,
And the soft snow, falling as gently
As an answer to prayer.
But an angel whispers, "O sister,
You must rise from your bed to pray,
In the silent, deserted chapel,
You must kneel till the dawn of day,
For, far on the desolate moorland,
So dreary, and bleak, and white,
There is one all alone and helpless,
In peril of death to-night.

No sound on the moorland to guide him,
No star in the murky air;
And he thinks of his home and his loved ones
With the tenderness of despair;
He has wandered for hours on the snow-drift,
And he tries to stand in vain,
And so lies down to dream of his children,
And never to rise again.
Then kneel in the silent chapel
Till the dawn of to-morrow's sun,
And ask of the Lord you worship
For the life of that desolate one;
And the smiling eyes of his children
Will gladden his heart again,
And the grateful tears of God's poor ones
Will fall on your soul like rain!

Yet leave him alone to perish,
And the grace of your God implore,
With all the strength of your spirit,
For one who needs it more.
Far away in the gleaming city,
Amid perfume, and song, and light,
A soul that Jesus has ransomed
Is in peril of sin to-night.
The tempter is close beside him,
And his danger is all forgot,
And the far off voices of childhood
Call aloud, but he hears them not;
He sayeth no prayer, and his mother—
He thinks not of her to-day,
And he will not look up to Heaven,
And his angel is turning away.

Then pray for a soul in peril,
A soul for which Jesus died;
Ask by the cross that bore Him,
And by her who stood beside,
And the angels of God will thank you,
And bend from their thrones of light,
To tell you that Heaven rejoices.
At the deed you have done to-night.

RETREAT OF NEY.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

One of the most memorable deeds of fortitude and heroism recorded in the annals of war was performed by Marshal Ney, in the retreat from Moscow. With a division of five thousand men he was cut off from the remainder of the French army. Kutusoff, the Russian General, with eighty thousand men, including numerous cavalry, and with two hundred pieces of artillery, had effectually blocked up his passage.

Ney, with his little band of half-famished soldiers, wavering in their languid march, with guns defective and dirty, and with but six pieces of cannon, rushed upon the hostile batteries, and maintained the unequal conflict, in the vain endeavor to cut his way through the masses of the foe, until night darkened the field. Then, at midnight with no thought even of surrender, he ordered his troops to turn upon their track, and march back again into the wilds of Russia.

With amazement the troops heard this command, which, without hesitation, they obeyed. It was cold, gloomy winter's night. The frozen ground was covered with snow, and the blast pierced the worn-out clothing of the soldiers. For two or three hours they traversed, in darkness, the savage waste till they came to a small river. Breaking the ice, to see in what direction the current ran, Ney said, "This stream must flow into the Dneiper. It shall be our guide."

The feeble band, cold, hungry and weary, struggled along until they reached the Dneiper. Its broad and rapid current was clogged with floating masses of ice, and in one spot only, to which a lame peasant conducted them, was the ice sufficiently firm for them to attempt a passage. And even here it was necessary to pass with the utmost caution. Ney, wrapped in his cloak, slept for an hour upon the snow, while his troops passed over in single file. The ice bent and cracked under their feet.

They then attempted to pass the wagons over, laden with the sick and wounded. The frail surface broke, and several of the wagons sank beneath the ice. A few faint cries only were heard, as the sufferers disappeared in their cold icy sepulchre. By crossing the Dneiper, Ney hoped, in a long detour, again to reach the army. The Russians followed this feeble band in its retreat, keeping beyond musket shot, but firing incessantly upon their victims with artillery, from every available eminence.

Napoleon was in Orcha, waiting, in the most intense anxiety, to hear tiding from Ney. Four days had passed without even a rumor of his fate. The whole army was looking back across the Dneiper, hoping to catch a glimpse of his advancing colums, or to hear the report of his artillery. At the close of the day of solitude and watching, another wintry night enveloped in its gloom these retreating, woe-stricken armies. Napoleon was partaking of a frugal supper with General Lefebvre when a shout of joy was heard in the street, and the words "Marshal Ney is safe," fell upon his ear. At that moment a Polish officer entered with the tidings that the Marshal was a few leagues distant, on the banks of the river, harrassed by pursuing Cossacks, and in want of immediate assistance. Napoleon sprang from his chair, seized the informant by both arms, and gazing into his eyes, exclaimed:

"Is that really true? Are you sure of it? I have two hundred millions of gold in my vaults at the Tuileries. I would have given them all to save Marshal Ney."

Instantly Eugene was dispatched with five thousand men, for the rescue of the Marshal. Eagerly the soldiers left their bivouac fires for their midnight march.—For six miles they toiled along through the snow and over an unknown path, often stopping to listen if they could hear any sound of their lost friends. The river, which was their only guide, flowed drear and chill at their side, encumbered by vast masses of floating ice. Gloomy forests of evergreens frowned along their path, and no sound but the tramp of Eugene's battallion disturbed the silence of the night.

At length Eugene ordered his artillery to be discharged, as a shout to call the attention of his friends. Listening anxiously, they heard far off in the distance, in apparent response, a feeble report of musketry. The Marshal had not a single piece of artillery left. Both parties, however, understood the language of their guns, and they hastened to meet each other. They were soon united. Officers and soldiers alike threw themselves into each other's arms, and many of these worn veterans wept for joy.

The reunited bands, forgetful of past perils and the still greater ones they were yet to encounter, returned rejoicingly to Orcha. As Marshal Ney with soldierly simplicity and unostentation, gave recital of the dangers and difficulties he had surmounted and the hardships he had endured, Napoleon grasped his hand, and immortalized him with the title of the "bravest of the brave." Again Napoleon said, in reference to this same achievement, in words which will never die, "Better is an army of deers commanded by a lion, than an army of lions commanded by a deer."

During this retreat an unnatural mother, who was one of the camp followers, weary of nursing her crying child, threw it out into the snow to perish. Ney chanced to witness the inhuman deed, and lifting up the child soothed it tenderly, and restored it to its mother, in the sledge, commanding the mother to take charge of it. But soon again the woman, whose heart was rendered callous by misery, threw the child into the snow. The Marshal again rescued the little one, and took it under his special protection, carrying it for some time in his own arms. The indignant soldiers hurled the mother from the sledge, and left her to be picked up by the Cossacks or to perish on the frozen ground. The little orphan was watched over with the greatest of care by the soldiers, as they covered it up with furs and blankets in one of sledges. The child was carried, in the arms of a soldier, through all the horrors of the passage of the Beresina, and surviving the hardships of the most disastrous retreat recorded in the history of war, at length reached Paris in safety.

In the passage of the Beresina, which soon ensued, Ney again displayed his heroism through scenes of horror which have rarely been paralelled, and never surpassed on this globe. The genius of the French engineers speedily threw two bridges across the stream. The French army consisted of but 27,000 fighting men, and a disorganized mass were struggling over these bridges, the Russians, from the adjacent heights were hurling upon them a storm of shot and shell.—Sixty thousand Russians manned those batteries. Ney, taking with him but eight thousand troops, plunged into the densest masses of the foe, drove them before him, and took six thousand prisoners.

Through the long hours of a winter's night this horrid scene of tumult and carnage continued. Thousands were crowded from the bridges into the icy stream, and sank with shrieks which rose above the thunders of the battle. A fearful tempest arose of wind and smothering snow. The black mass of men and wagons, enabled the Russians to direct their guns with more unerring aim. The howling of the storm, the gloom of night, the flash and roar of artillery, the explosion of shells and whistling of balls and bullets, the cries of onset and the shrieks of the dying, presented a spectacle which has given the Passage of the Beresina perhaps the most prominent position among all the horrors which have occurred in this lost world. The numbers lost have never been fully ascertained. Thousands were swept to an unknown burial. But, in the Spring, as the ice melted, twelve thousand corpses were dragged from the river.

Unity in Family Government.

In the whole community, not the head of a family can be found, who does not know, who will not acknowledge, that a unity, both in theory and in practice, between the father and mother of a family, is absolutely essential to the proper government of the children, and that a difference in parental administration is fatal to the best interests of those who are its unfortunate subjects. Even in those unhappy cases, where an irreconcilable difference of opinion exists between the father and mother, in regard to the best modes or means of family government, if they have any vestige of good sense remaining or any glimmering perceptions of propriety, they will keep that difference to themselves. When before their children, it will be one of the interdicted subjects of conversation, and they will earnestly endeavor that the practical administration of the one shall not counterwork that of the other. What deplorable consequences must result from an open collision between those to whom allegiance is jointly due! How can children ever learn to obey, when a command issued by one parent is countermanded by the other? What salutary efficacy can there ever be in discipline, when the half corrected child snatched from the hand that is administering punishment, and the offender is left to read his present justification, and his future impunity, in the rebuke which is given to the corrector? What self-denial will a child ever learn to practice, if a dainty forbidden to him by one parent is openly and secretly given to him by the other? A state of anarchy is bad enough, in which to rear up children; but two hostile sovereigns, alternately exercising their authority, granting exemption from other's law, and vainly striving to enforce their own, would ruin any kingdom, though its subjects were angels.
