LOVE LIGHTENS LABOR.

A good wife rose from her bed one morn,
And thought with a nervous dread,
Of the piles of clothes to be washed, and more
Than a dozen mouths to be fed;
There's the meals to get for the men in the field,
And the children to fix away
To school, and the milk to be skimmed and churned;
And all to be done this day.

It had rained in the night, and all the wood
Was wet as wet could be;
There were puddings and pies to bake, besides
A loaf of cake for tea;
And the day was hot, and her aching head
Throbbed wearily as she said,
"If maidens but knew what good wives know,
They would be in no haste to wed!"

"Jennie, what do you think I told Ben Brown?"
Called the farmer from the well;
And a flush crept to his bronzed brow,
And his eyes half bashfully fell;
"It was this," he said—and coming near
He smiled, and stooping down,
Kissed her cheek—"'Twas this; that you the best
And the dearest wife in town!"

The farmer went back to the field, and the wife,
In a smiling and absent way,
Sang snatches of tender little songs
She'd not sung for many a day,
And the pain in her head was gone, and the clothes
Were white as the foam of the sea;
Her bread was light and her butter was sweet,
And as golden as it could be.

"Just think," the children all called in a breath,
"Tom Wood has run off to sea!
He wouldn't, I know; if he only had
A home as happy as we."
The night came down, and the good wife smiled
To herself, as she softly said,
"'Tis so sweet to labor for those we love,
It's not strange that maids will wed!"

The Wife.

It needs no guilt to break a husband's heart. The absence of content, the mutterings of spleen, the untidy dress and cheerless home, the forbidding scowl and deserted heart—these, and other nameless neglects, without a crime among them, have harrowed to the quick the heart's core of man, and planted there beyond the reach of cure, germs of dark despair. O, may woman, before that sight arrives, dwell on the recollections of her youth, cherishing the dear idea of that tuneful time, awaken and keep alive the promise she so kindly gave. And though she may be the injured—not the injuring one—the forgotten and not the forgetting wife—a happy allusion to the hour of peaceful love—a kindly welcome to a comfortable home—a smile of love to banish hostile words—a kiss of peace to pardon all the past, and the hardest heart that ever locked itself within the breast of selfish man, will soften to her charms, and bid her live, as she had hoped, her years of matchless bliss—loved, loving and content—the source of comfort and the spring of joy.

Willie's Home.

We have rarely seen a simple child story that more touched us than the following, which we find in an exchange:

"This is my home!" cried the little one, a treasured boy of four summers, as fresh and rosy he came from school at the close of a short winter's afternoon.

"Indeed, little Willie," said his father, "why is it? Suppose you go out on the sidewalk, and try at the next door; suppose you step into the entry, throw off your little sack as you have done here, and go into the parlor, would not that be your home?"

"No indeed," said Willie, "it would not be."

"But tell me why not?"

Willie had never thought of this. He paused a moment. Then directing his eyes to where his mother quietly sat sewing, he replied with an earnest gesture:

"She lives here."

STOPPING A NEWSPAPER.—One of our exchanges has the following allegory, which we commend to careful consideration:

"A certain man hit his toe against a pebble, and fell headlong to the ground. He was vexed, and under the influence of anger and self-sufficiency he kicked the mother earth right saucily. With imperturbable gravity he looked to see the earth itself dissolve and come to naught. But the earth remained, and only his poor foot was injured in the encounter. This is the way of man. An article in a newspaper touches him in a weak spot, and forthwith he sends to stop his paper. With great complacency he looks to see the crash, when he finds he only hit his own toe against a world that does not perceptibly feel the shock, and injures no one but himself.

☞ S. C. Hall related the following anecdote at the dinner-table of a distinguished poet in London: "A worldling was once visited, in his illness, by a well-meaning but dolorous clergyman, who disfigured his countenance and wore a face of perpetual mourning. As his visage appeared in the doorway, the sick man started and exclaimed: Why! what's the matter? You look as if your religion didn't agree with you.

☞ If knee breeches are to constitute a portion of the full evening dress of the creme de la creme of society this season, there will be a great many fatted calves about, and the women will not be the only persons justly charged with using paddings.—N. Y. Express.

There is no man but hath a soul; and, if he will carefully attend to that, he need not complain for want of business.

How to Build an Ice House.

A subscriber wishes to know how to construct an ice house that will supply four families; whether to make above or below ground; in a grove, by the side of a stream, or on the open prairie, etc.

There are very few men who favor making ice-houses under ground, as it is found that ice wastes faster from the heat derived from the earth than from that received directly from the sun. We would commend building in the shade rather than on the open prairie, as the air would be somewhat cooler. Near the stream would be a convenient site for the building, as it would be but little trouble to put the blocks of ice into it, and the spaces between the blocks could then be easily filled with water and frozen during some of the severest days of winter. Wood is generally regarded as the cheapest and best material to use in the construction of an ice-house, as it is necessary to have a hollow or double wall and a filling of some non-conducting substance in any case.

A building eight feet high, eight by twelve on the ground, would doubtless be of sufficient capacity for supplying four families and allow one-fourth of the ice to go to waste.

Many persons build ice-houses by placing the sills directly on the ground; but our experience is that the ice will keep better if the building is entirely supported by upright posts, which we would prefer to have imbedded in charcoal. This allows a free circulation of air under the building and provides for suitable drainage. The only difference between building an ice-house and any other building, is that it must be a double building—one inside of the other—at least as far as the walls are concerned. The space between the walls will depend upon the efficiency of the non-conductor used for filling; if it is to be pulverized charcoal, six inches would be sufficient; but if saw dust or spent tan bark is to be the material, then a foot would be the proper distance. The roof may be made double like the wall, but it is a cheaper plan to make a floor across from the eaves, which may be covered on top with loose saw dust. If this plan be adopted, the walls of the gable ends may be single, and a door can be cut through one of them and through the floor across the eaves, through which the ice can be passed into the building. It is well to divide off a few feet on each end of the building for a cooling room for milk or a room for keeping fresh meat and vegetables. The doors leading into and out of this room should be double like the walls, and may be either fitted with heavy hinges or made to slide. An ice-house should be opened but once a day, which should be as early in the morning as possible.—Germantown Telegraph.

Keeping Sweet Potatoes.

The potatoes should be taken from the ground so that they are not bruised, and left in the sun till they are quite dry. The manner of storing them to keep over the winter will depend on the conveniences at hand. If you have a cool, dry cellar, that will answer well for storing them in; or if you have an open chamber or attic over the cook room that does not freeze, they may be placed there. They will keep best and be in the best condition for the table if they are kept in a temperature which is quite cool. The atmosphere of the room should be dry, but not so dry as to shrivel them. Sweet potatoes will not keep if placed in heaps like common potatoes, they require some substance between them to keep them from coming in contact and to absorb moisture. A great number of things have been recommended for this purpose, as oats, saw-dust, chaff, cut-straw and bran. These substances are useful as they serve to keep the rot from spreading from one potato to another. Many recommend sand for packing them in; if this is used it should be well dried in the sun. We have recently seen rotten wood recommended in a Southern paper, as the best substance to use in packing. Old flour barrels are very convenient for packing purposes. Put a thin layer of either of the materials spoken of on the bottom; then put on a layer of the potatoes as close as they can be put without touching, and continue in this manner to the top of the barrel, which may then be headed up.—Prairie Farmer.

How to Use Lime as a Manure.

The American Agriculturist says:

We have more faith in large doses of lime than in small. One hundred bushels per acre will often so change the character of the soil that the beneficial effects will be observed for twenty or thirty years. A convenient way to apply the lime is to plow the land and then as the lime is drawn from the kiln to put it on the field in heaps 20 feet apart each way, and a bushel of lime in each heap. Then cover the heaps with a few inches of soil, and as soon as the lime is slaked, spread the whole evenly over the land with a shovel, and harrow or plow it in, and sow the crop. This gives about one hundred bushels per acre, and as none of the lime has to be thrown more than 10 feet it is easily spread. We should prefer to use the lime on a summer fallow for wheat, as this affords more time to attend to it. But it may be applied to any crop. If your land is drained, naturally or artificially and is well summer-fallowed and then limed as above, you may expect good wheat and good clover, and no matter how much it is "worn," when you have once got good clover you can easily make your land bring large crops.

☞ Clover can be plowed down too often in loamy soil. It makes it too loose, and the wheat is more easily frozen out. The surface should be well rolled in the fall, and, if the ground is dry enough, it should be rolled in the spring before the wheat starts much.

☞ Why are curds like the opposite house? Because they are over the whey.
