

The Farmers' Column.

When to Use Lime and Plaster.

A successful cultivator, contributes the following suggestions on this subject:

The value of lime or plaster, as a manure, depends upon the component parts of the soil to which it is applied. All land has more or less sulphuric acid in it, caused by the decomposition of iron pyrites. The presence of this acid may generally be known by the appearance of the soil, and particularly of the stones. If there is any rust or oxide of iron, in the soil, or in the stones, or on the top of the water that filtrates through the soil, or if the water is hard, it indicates the presence of sulphuric acid.

If land on which grass seed is sown is "slow to catch" or sod over, or catches in patches, it indicates the presence of sulphuric acid.

If the roots of clover and herd-grass in the spring stand two or three inches out of the ground, and in detached parcels, with bare ground between them, it is the work of sulphuric acid. On such land plaster is a positive injury.

If clover and tame grasses die out, and are succeeded by wire grass, sorrel or sour dock, it is caused by sulphuric acid. Put on lime and keep off plaster.

The reason why plaster should not be used on land charged with sulphuric acid is, that plaster is composed of lime and sulphur, and applying that is adding more of that with which the land is already overcharged. On such land apply lime, which unites with the sulphuric acid, and forms plaster. The lime thus neutralizes the acid; and the acid thus neutralizes the lime, and forms a compound nutriment for vegetation.

The reason why the ground appears so hard where the earth is charged with sulphurie acid, is that the old stubble has been eaten up by the acid.

The sulphuric acid in plaster, applied to land not overcharged by that substance decomposes vegetation, and fits it for nourishing the living plants. When there is an excess of the acid it eats up the vegetation, both dead and living. This is the reason why soils over-charged with acid are always deficient in vegetable matter. And soils free from it have an excess of vegetable matter in a decomposed state.

The presence of this acid is the cause of sorrel and sour dock and sour grass. The land is literally sour and Nature is trying to throw it from her stomach through these exerescences.

The rule then is, if your land has too much sulphuric acid, or is sour, give it a good coat of lime; if destitute of acid, apply plaster.

—:o:—

Barley.

We do not know that there is any serious hindrance to the growth of this crop in Maryland, other than a want of familiarity with it, and the manner of cultivating it. It is a good spring crop, where it is grown, paying much better than oats, spring wheat, or other grain crop. It is not considered an exhausting crop. There is no mystery or difficulty in the cultivation of it. The grain usually brings a good price, and the straw is better than that of wheat for feeding. The market for it is limited and might be soon overstocked, but in the general want of acquaintance with it, this is not likely to be, and the price is generally good. The crop of oats is generally a very poor one, and there are many farmers who would be glad of a substitute that would pay better. For the benefit of such we write this article. Mr. John Johnson commends barley as a crop that will take heavy manuring that would cause wheat to fall, and thinks on that account it is a good crop to precede wheat which we wish to manure abundantly, While barley is not considered an exhausting crop yet from want of what we may call ability to seek its food, needs to have it abundantly supplied in a rich or highly manured soil. Mr. J. thinks, therefore, that the barley should have the manure first, and will leave the ground in the best state for wheat. The best soil for barley is a medium loam, yet this is not more essential for it than for other crops, provided fertility and thorough working be not wanting. A lighter soil than is considered suitable for wheat is very good for barley. The preparation for this crop is such working as is given our Indian corn or other common hoed crops, and therefore it comes well after corn that has been abundantly manured, to occupy the time between it and wheat. In other words, taking the place of oats. It requires clean culture to precede it, and cannot, therefore, go upon a common fallow, but a clean clover sod that we do not wish to plough in summer, may be broken late in the fall for early spring sowing in barley, and in this way prepared for the next year's wheat seeding. It must have a thoroughly drained soil, and the preparation of the ground must be very fine and mellow. This must be made as early as practicable; for there is great gain in sowing this as well as other spring grains as early as possible. From two and a half to three bushels of seed are sown to the acre, and the two-rowed variety is considered the best. Put the seed in with a very light furrow, or with the drill. It is advised to roll the surface when the grain is three or four inches high, if it be light, or if it have a crust upon it. It should be cut a little green, as the grain is thus brighter, and it is very liable, too, to shatter if very ripe when cut. At the same time, care must be taken, as it shrinks very much if cut too green. It is a good crop to grow grass seeds with.

—:o:—

Poppy raising and opium manufacture is likely to become an important branch of industry in Addison county, Vermont. Last year a man in Moncton raised poppies and manufactured opium to the value of $3,000, and a number of farmers propose this year to cultivate the plant quite extensively. There are to be several acres of poppies on one farm in East Middlebury.

THE BEAUTIFUL GATE.

I have read and dreamed of a beautiful gate,
Moving on hinges of purest gold,
On the other side of the River of Death,
Whose waters are dark, and dreary, and cold.

Many have reached the deep, dark stream,
On its quiet brink to watch and wait
For the messenger pale, to bear them across
Its waveless tide to the Golden Gate.

The first one that left our household band
Was one who had eyes of deepest blue,
With a brow as fair as a pale spring flower,
And a heart as pure as the morning dew.

Long she lay on a bed of pain,
Long, very long, did she hope and wait,
My angel sister, where is she now?
She has entered in at the Golden Gate.

An angel came, and within her arms
She bore her away to her home above;
I caught the gleam of a glittering band,
And heard sweet words from a hymn of love.

But the angel guest soon came again,
And another one left our broken band—
Another one passed through the Golden Gate
Into the beautiful shining land.

Mother, oh! mother, I cried in my grief,
How long on earth must I weep and wait?
"Till it pleaseth God," a voice replied,
To call thee home through the Golden Gate.

Thus one by one they all passed away,
While I am left, lonely and desolate,
How I sometimes yearn for the angel to come
And bear me through the Golden Gate.

In fancy I see my mother's face,
And my gentle sister's violet eyes;
And the rest that have left me, I see them too,
Looking down at me from the azure skies.

When the slanting rays of the setting sun
A glory of molten gold create,
A child's soft whisper reaches my ear:—
"We are waiting for thee, at the Golden Gate."

When the sun moves south in the autumn sky,
And the leaves their branches all forsake,
I know that I like them will die,
And pass to my rest through the Golden Gate.

The Miseries of Country Doctors.

Speaking of aggravated cases, did you ever think, reader, of the aggravations to which doctors are subjected, when called up at night for the most frivolous reasons? The following is communicated by a brother:

In the old saddle-bag period of doctoring, when a doctor's circuit extended for miles and his headquarters were in the saddle, the doctor's position was no sinecure, though his mission was to cure sinners. His services were in demand night and day, on all pretences, and such a thing as a square night's rest could never be assured to him. This latter affliction was very hard to be borne, and there occurred many trials to his temper through nocturnal invasion that even the remembrance of it in the bill, hardly compensated. An ancient Medicus, who rode one of the widest of these circuits, sowing calomel broadcast, had returned at the close of one stormy day, particularly weary, he having assisted at the addition of two to the human population, besides attending to the whole of a large practice. He ate his supper, sat awhile in his slippers before the fire, enjoying a mug of flip, and went to bed, happy in the hope that he should not be called. He had just got asleep when his door-knocker banged furiously, and he started up to learn that old Mrs. Moore, at the furthest bound of his beat, wished to see him. Wouldn't it do in the morning? he asked the messenger. "No, the old lady was perticler," and so he reluctantly got into his clothes for his five miles ride. She was one of his best customers, and he wouldn't offend her.—On reaching her house, she told him she had taken a violent cold and wanted him to give her something to make her sneeze! The doctor thought of his distant bed with a swearing sigh, and gave her enough bayberry snuff to keep her sneezing till next morning. This was some consolation to him as he drove home.

How to Breathe.

The action of respiration should never be carried on through the mouth. "God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life." The correctness of the inspired writer is fully sustained by modern physiology. The mischievous habit of carrying on the action of respiration through the mouth instead of through the nose, is the real origin of almost all the diseases of the lungs and even consumption itself. Medical writers tell us that the excessive perspiration to which some are liable in their sleep and which is so weakening to the system, is mainly the result of sleeping with the mouth open. Whether you walk, sit, read, write or sleep, keep your mouth closed, except when engaged in conversation or necessary vocal reading. The philosophy is this: The velocity of blood through the body and the heat of the body itself, depends mainly upon the quantity of atmospheric air taken into the lungs. Nature measures that quantity by the nose. When the mouth is employed, the measure is too great, but just sufficient when the nostrils are used. An excess of air overheats the body, while the passage through the mouth otherwise injuriously affects the throat. The habits of children in this respect should be carefully watched and regulated. Open mouths produce a vacant and unseemly appearance, and may be regarded as a very sure precursor of habitual colds and sore throat.

"So you are going to teach school?" said a young lady to her friend.

"Well, for my part I don't see how I can do that, I would marry a widower with nine children."

"I would prefer that myself," was the quiet reply; "but where is the widower?"

The "Who" that so generally decides "when doctors disagree," is usually some shallow pretender.

Accost not with feigned friendship those to whom your heart is averse.
