

The Farmers' Column.

The True System of Farming.

Trying to do too much is a common error into which the farmer often falls. His great eagerness in striving to be rich is doubtless the cause of his error. He is ambitious and energetic, and forms his plans on a large scale, too often, perhaps, without counting the cost. He buys a large farm and wants to be called a "large farmer," without understanding or considing the true elements that constitute a real farmer. He fancies the greatness of that profession, as is too often the common estimate, to be in proportion to the number of acres, not to say cultivated, embraced within the boundaries of his domain. The fact is now being spread abroad, that a large farm does not make a man either rich, contented or happy, but on the contrary, the reverse of all these, unless well tilled, where his labor is rewarded by ample crops and fair success in the various departments in which he is engaged. No farmer can realize the full benefits of his profession without adopting a thorough system of culture. His success, commensurate to his wishes, always depends upon the manner in which he prepares his grounds, plants his seeds, and rears his stock. Neither of these departments, which may be considered the cardinal ones of his profession, will take care of themselves. The soil may be rich, but it needs culture. His seed may be sown, but it should be in due time, and always on soil well prepared, and of a suitable quality for the production of the crop desired. His stock must be constantly cared for—it derives its thrift from the soil, and sends again to that soil the sustenance it requires; but this is not done in a loose or haphazard way. The farmer's care is required, and all his better judgment must be exercised in keeping up this system of reciprocal benefits that may be realized by every intelligent and industrious farmer.

Thorough cultivation and systematic attention to all parts of his business is indispensible to a good degree of success. The very corner-stone of this whole system of farming, is to do what you do thoroughly—nature will not be cheated, and never gives full returns to the half-way work that is practiced by vastly too many calling themselves farmers. If the land has been worn, the extent of that exhaustion and the food required must be first considered. When ascertained, the full measure of these requirements must be given, to bring out full returns. If the farm has but a small stock, and consequently but a small amount of manure to replenish his land, it is obvious that but a small farm can be supplied with it; and good judgment at once dictates that to cultivate properly a large farm, artificial manures must be used if good crops are obtained. And so with labor; two men cannot suitably till one hundred acres of land, when the labor of two, and perhaps four, might be profitably employed on seventy-five acres.

This is the great error in farming. Two men strive to do what four can hardly do, and thus thousands of acres are run over, half tilled, and producing half crops. The land is run over till worn out, sustaining year after year the annual tax, till its energies are entirely exhausted, and it fails to yield even a feeble crop, because its life is worn out.

The light that is being spread abroad on this subject is beginning to correct this practice to some extent, but in most instances very little is returned to the soil to keep it alive, till after several years of continual cropping it manifests signs of exhaustion and ultimate barrenness. When tillers of the soil understand their true interests, they will cultivate no more of the land than they can do well. Fifty acres of land for tillage, brought to a high state of cultivation, pays better than one hundred run over in the way that many do.

—:o:—

Improved Varieties of Wheat.

Whether it is desirable to cultivate many or few varieties of wheat at the same time on a farm may be regarded differently by different persons. We think three or four varieties sufficient, as rendering partial success more certain and total failure less probable. The productiveness of any one variety of wheat differs from year to year, owing to different conditions of climate, season and soil, during the active period of the plant's growth, and while one variety fails another may succeed. Thus in a very dry season the long straw varieties are most productive, while in a wet season, the plant growing very luxuriously, the shorter varieties succeed best. By reason of these irregularities it is both prudent and necessary to success to cultivate several varieties at the same time on a farm. Every farmer should ascertain by experiment for himself what varieties are best suited to his particular soils and circumstances. But a blind preference for any kind of wheat, because it has been successfully cultivated for a long time in one's neighborhood, without testing its worth with other varieties, is to be deprecated and condemned as much as constant shifting year after year from one new kind to another, in the vain hope of finding a variety that will cast all others in the shade.—N. Y. Times.

—:o:—

WHY CATTLE AND OTHER STOCK DIE TOWARD SPRING.—When the stock is not regularly fed, and the supply of respiratory food is deficient, nature avails herself of the fat previously stored in the animal's body as fuel to sustain the animal heat, and where the food is deficient and there is no accumulation of fat to supply its place, the muscle and other portion of the body are consumed, and death by gradual starvation is the consequence. Farmers, keep your stock well fed if you do not want to sustain losses toward spring.—Farm Journal.

—:o:—

WOOD ASHES and soap-suds abound in fertilising ingredients and should be carefully husbanded. Used in compost heaps they are invaluable for the potash and other salts which they furnish.

THE CONTRAST.

[The following verses from an English paper are attributed to the same pen that produced the beautiful lines on Sir John Moore.]

Written under Windsor Terrace, Feb. 17, 1820.

I saw him last night on this terrace proud,
Walking in health and gladness,
Begirt with his Court, and in all the crowd
Not a single look of sadness,

Bright was the sun, and the leaves were green,
Blithely the birds were singing;
The cymbal replied to the tambourine,
And the bells were merrily ringing.

I have stood by the crowd beside his bier,
When not a word was spoken;
But every eye was dim with a tear,
And silence by sobs was broken.

I have heard the earth on his coffin pour,
To the muffled drum's deep rolling;
While the minute-gun, with its solemn roar,
Drowned the death-bell's tolling.

The time since he walked in his glory thus,
To the grave till I saw him carried,
Was an age of the mightiest change to us,
But to him, a night unvaried.

A daughter beloved—a queen—a son,
And a son's sole child have perished;
And sad was each heart, save the only one
By which they were fondest cherished.

For his eyes were sealed, and his mind was dark,
And he sat in his age's lateness,
Like a vision throned as a solemn mark
Of the frailty of human greatness.

His silver beard, o'er a bosom spread
Unvexed by life's commotion,
Like a yearly lengthening snow-drift shed
On the calm of a frozen ocean.

Still o'er him oblivion's waters lay,
Though the stream of time kept flowing:
When they spoke of our King, 'twas but to say:
The old man's strength is going.

At intervals thus the waves disgorge—
By weakness rent asunder—
A piece of the wreck of the Royal George,
For the people's pity and wonder.

He is gone at length; he is laid in the dust;
Death's hands his slumbers breaking;
For the coffin's sleep of the good and just
Is a sure and blissful awaking.

His people's heart is his funeral urn,
And should sculptured stone be denied him,
There will his name be found when, in turn,
We lay our heads beside him.

Death and the Grave.

"I am hungry," said the grave. "Give me food."

Death answered: "I will send forth a minister of destruction and you shall be satisfied."

"What minister will you send?"

"I will send alcohol. He shall go in the guise of food and medicine, pleasure, hospitality. The people shall drink and die."

And the Grave answered: "I am content."

And now the Church bells began to toll and the mournful procession to advance.

"And who are they bringing now?" said the Grave.

"Ah," said Death, "they are bringing a household. The drunken father aimed a blow at his wife. He killed the mother and her child together, and then dashed out his own life."

"And who," said the Grave, "comes next, followed by a train of weeping children?"

"This is a broken-hearted woman who has long pined away in want while her husband has wasted his substance at the tavern. And he too is borne behind, killed by the hands of violence."

"And who next?"

"A young man of generous impulses, who, step by step, became dissipated and squandered his all. My agent turned him out to be frozen in the street."

"Hush!" said the Grave, "now I hear a wail of anguish that will not be silenced."

"Yes, the widow's cry. It is the only son of his mother. He spurned her love, reviled her rod, and a bloated corpse he comes to thee. And thus they come—further than the eye can reach, the procession crowds thy dark abodes. And still lured by the enchanting cup which I have mingled, the sons of men crowd the path of dissipation. Vainly they dream of escape, but I shut behind them the invincible door of destiny. They know it not, and with song and dance and riot they haste to thee, O Grave! Then I throw my fatal spell upon new throngs of youth and soon they, too, will be thine."

Feminine Tactics.

A favorite method of destroying or marring the matrimonial prospects of each other is, when any young woman is evidently rising into the realms of belleshood, to report her engaged, always taking care to speak of the victim as really very charming, but engaged. You will hear some of your friends thus disposed of, whom you are quite certain have no idea of giving up the privilege of single blessedness. It is only necessary to be seen with a gentleman a few times to start the thing; and when it is fastened upon you no amount of protestation will make society disbelieve it, so that you have but two alternatives; either to marry the man in cold blood, or else drive him away and lose his society and friendship. Fortunately for the men, there exist some sensible women who won't let an idle report break up their pleasant relations with a gentleman, but have the nerve and good sense to live down the silly gossip of those people who take this method of annoying them. Besides, a man who is attracted by a charming girl and allows himself to be scared off, bullied or intimidated by a "report" of her engagement, don't deserve her, and is a poor stick at best.

☞ It is more criminal to risk deceiving others by laudation of that of which we possess no knowledge, than to condemn without information of actual demerit.
