

The Farmers' Column.

Some Words of Advice to Farmers and their Households.

From the Maryland Farmer.

A constant residence in the country and work in the fresh pure air ought to be conducive to long life—almost all the conditions that should make the doctor's visits "few and far between" are answered by it. The lungs are well expanded; the muscles all brought into regular use, and the food abundant. Why then are not the generality of our farmers older men at their decease? It is a recognized fact that their average length is shorter than that of men working at other and seeming less healthful vocations. Some of the causes which lead to this distinction between farm and city life we should not have space enough to explain in the com pass of this article. A few words of advice and warning is all we can give. In the first place the muscles of the body in the busier seasons of farm work—a season which in many cases does not come to an end until the depth of winter—instead of being judiciously exercised, are unavoidably subjected to severe and long continued overstrain. In rain or shine the operations of the farm must go on. There is always something to be done. Often the work gets behind-hand, and has to be made up by extra exertions. When night comes the frame is utterly weary and worn out. Supper is no sooner ended than sleep, heavy and deep, presses upon the eyelids. Stiff, aching and unrested, the man arises in the morning to go through the same exhausting routine. All this work tells slowly but surely on the physical force. The farmer at fifty not unfrequently looks vastly older than the city man of the same age.

Is not this to a considerable extent the farmer's own fault. It is true that in his occupation, of all others, there is no end to the work to be done. Let him press and urge it as much as he will there is still more to be attended to than his utmost exertions can compass. The primary reason why this is the case is that he almost invariably attempts to make up in extent of area for the lack of fertility in the soil itself, and so does not adapt the amount of work to be done to the force required to do it easily and properly. We are, of course, speaking of farmers of moderate means, and who engage personally with the male members of the family in doing a large portion of the work of the farm.

Not only does this daily round of hard labor tax the energies of the farmer and his sons, but the wife and the daughters also suffer incidentally from it. It is no easy matter in the absence of that help which is so much needed and so frequently not to be had, for the wife to board the hands, to cook and wash, attend to the cows and often to the garden in addition, with only such assistance as the younger members of the family can give her. Such onerous duties are well calculated to break down prematurely the stoutest and the strongest.

But apart from the injury done to the health by overwork it may and frequently does suffer from other causes, many of which are preventible. In some districts the drinking water is scarce, or impure. The water of living springs, when kept free from noxious matters, is invariably conducive to health. But where wells and cisterns are used, the greatest caution requires to be exercised to prevent the water from becoming contaminated either through defective drainage or the presence of deleterious sediment. Besides this, there is danger from the decay of vegetable matter in proximity to the household, and in the heaps of refuse which but too often left neglected until diseases of a typhoid type and the counsel of the physician necessitate their removal.

Dense shade near the dwelling has also an injurious effect on the health of the family, It promotes dampness, and although it may not often be the primary cause of disease, yet if the seeds of certain maladies are in the system, the exclusion of air and sunshine will sensibly retard the recovery of the patient—more especially is this the case where there is a hereditary tendency to consumption.

Give a dwelling, therefore, free access to sunshine and fresh air. Avoid a low location, and a damp, compact subsoil, which will not admit of efficient drainage. Remove from the cellars and the vicinity of the house, all vegetable matters that by their decay promote disease. Be careful that the water used for household purposes is pure, and in the operations of the farm, seek by high farming to produce heavy crops from a few acres, and thus bring the labor required to cultivate them within the easy compass of the force to be employed, rather than wear out the strength and destroy the health by attempting to compensate by overwork for the want of fertility in the soil.

Market Gardening in the United States.

The census returns show, in the Eastern and Middle States, a decrease in the production of live stock and of staple grains, and an increase in vegetables and garden crops. Grain farming and stock raising are rapidly shifting to the West. Texas has shown an infinite capacity to crowd the markets of the country with low-priced beef—a competition which the Eastern farmers cannot resist. The virgin lands of the frontier, with their unbroken fertility, are as yet too much for the worn soils of the older States, even with the advantage of scientific culture. Instead of bewailing these new conditions of production, the farmers of the East are turning attention to vegetable crops to supply the necessities of the large village and city populations that the last decade has amassed. Potatoes, turnips, cabbages, onions, carrots, beans, eggs, milk, butter, poultry, all find a profitable home market, and relieve the farmer from his most laborious tasks. The farmer must no longer be ashamed of his truck-patch, for here he finds one of the greatest sources of profit in his calling.

Selected Poetry.

From the Battle Creek Journal.

Betsey and I Are In.

BY T. OWEN WARD.

Good morning! Mister lawyer, I've brought these papers back,
I took 'em home to Betsey—I did, it is a fact,
We've read them over and over—you smile.
but it's a truth—
We hate to leave the love we loved when in our youth.

We talked the matter over, I handed Betsey
the pen,
She wrote her name right bold and full, and,
just turning then,
"John," says she, "I wrote that name full
two score years ago,
When you and I were young and very happy
you know."

"Before we had thought of heaven, except the one on earth
We found on the little hillside farm around
our cheerful hearth;
The cow it wasn't a cow, but a sickly, scrawny calf,
I labored day and night to save—now John
you needn't laugh."

"And the joke, was but a joke—how easy
they are to start—
I will confess, that at the time, I thought
'twould break my heart,
But I was partly in the wrong and partly it was you—
What say you John? let's tear this up, and begin again anew?

The bowl I broke by accident, 'twas not worth a cent,
You scolded me and I replied, and so the matter went,
Word brought on word—but John, 'tis time
we settled this dispute,
And now when years of seed time's past we should gather in our fruit."

"The fact is, arg'in heaven and our peculiar creed,
Does us no good, and then, you know, our daily wants and need Require that both us work, and 'tend to our thriving farm;
And the boy that now is ours, he needs a father's arm."

My heart began to flutter—it did—I will confess
I was a little hasty when I came up here.
Yes,
We thought the stock was better remaining
on the farm,
Where both of us could 'tend 'em, and keep
'em safe from harm.

"The farm-house would be lonely without me," Betsey says,
For on this little hillside farm we've passed
our happiest days,
And the 'couple hundred dollars laid by for a rainy day'
Left 'in the hands of good men,' the interest is 'tol'rable pay.'

Yes, we've lived so long together I hate to leave you now,
To stub along on the farm alone; to feed the
pig and cow;
I hate to leave my home and out in the world to roam;
For Betsey's a skeery critter, when I'm away from home.

Again—I may have a fever—I do not know how soon—
I may be as hot as blazes and crazier than a loon—
And want some one to 'tend me, and always be in sight;
Betsey never leaves me but sticks to me day
and night.

I like a house that's tidy, a kitchen neat and clean,
A wife that's kind'er loving—and not always mean—
I have complained of Betsey and many of her acts,
Lawyer; we've made up our quarrel—I've stated you the facts.

We've 'cluded the "stock of temper" we both
had in the start,
Better be reduced a little 'fore it drives us
apart—
And "I have talked with Betsey and Betsey
has talked with me,
And we have agreed together," hereafter
we'll always agree.

The bowl that poured dissensions we've broken all to smash,.
And the "cow-critter" 's dead, and, perhaps, made into hash,'
And heaven is where it was when we began to fight;
Now, lawyer, take these papers and put them out of sight.

WICKED BEN.—It may be said of Ben Butler, with as much truth as of the French revolutionist, Barene, that the impulse which drove him from a party in adversity to a party in prosperity, was as irresistible as that which drives the cuokoo and the swallow towards the sun when the dark and cold months are approaching. The law which binds the pilot-fish to the shark is the only one which he acknowledges. "Ken ye," said a shrewd Scotch lord, who was asked his opinion of James the First, "Ken ye a John Ape? If I have Jacko by the collar I can make him bite you; but if you have Jacko, you can make him bite me." Just now the Rads have got Jacko by the collar. If Democratic fortunes improve, we shall get him back some day, and then see if he don't make the fur fly.
