Harnessing Horses Correctly.

When harnessed correctly, a strong horse is a powerful animal; but by an imperfect adjustment of the gaering, many strong teams are shorn of half their strength, and many are often worried more by an improper fit of the harness, or by a decidedly bad attachment to the vehicle they are drawing, than by all the service they perform. But few teamsters have ever been taught how to harness a horse correctly; and fewer still have learned that there is a right way and wrong way to hitch a team to a carriage. When a harness is taken from the shop, every part should be adjusted to fit the horse that is to wear it. The back-band should be let out or buckled up, until it will be neither to long nor too short when the animal is drawing a load. Many a good horse has had a large sore made on his back simply because the back-band of the harness was buckled up too far. The breeching should also be adjusted properly, so that the horse will not seem like a man in a boy's coat, nor like a colt wearing the harness of a full-grown horse.—The collar should fit as neatly to the animal's neck as an easy pair of shoes fit on one feet. The collar should never be so long that a man can thrust his arm easily between the neck of the animal and the lower end of the collar. Many horses—especially old ones—when thin in flesh, require collars so small that they cannot be put over the heads of the horses that wear them. It is of imminent importance that the proprietors of teams should see to such minor points, and provide collars that are open at the top or bottom. Every horse should have his own collar and harness, as much as every man his own boots and coat. The lines are often adjusted in such a manner, that the heads of both horses are hauled away from each other so far that the team cannot travel easily.—At other times their heads are drawn too far inward toward each other. The lines should be adjusted so that the heads may be held just as far apart as the length of the double whiffle-tree. When a team is attached to a carriage or lumber-wagon, the breast-straps, stay-chains or neck-yoke should be so adjusted that the pole or tongue cannot strike either horse. The tongue is often allowed to have so much play that it whangs the arms or shoulders of the team with terrible force when the vehicle is being drawn over rough ways. The neck-yoke straps or tongue-chains should be drawn up so as to elevate the tongue between the shoulders, where the lateral jerking or thrusting will be received by the gearing on the necks of the animals rather than against the unprotected arm or shoulders of the team.—Practical Farmer.

Linseed Tea for Sick Horses.

Linseed tea is not only valuable as a restorative for sick horses, but is exceedingly useful in cases of inflamation of the membranes peculiar to the organs of respiration and digestion; it shields and lubricates the same; tranquilizes the irrifable parts, and favors healthy action. We have prescribed linseed tea in large quantities, for horses laboring under the prevailing influenza; they seemed to derive much benefit from it, and generally drank it with avidity. Aside from the benefit we derive from the action of mucilage and oil which the seed contains, its nutritive elements are of some account, especially when given to animals laboring under soreness in the organs of deglutition, which incapacitates from swallowing more solid food. In the event of an animal becoming prostrated by inability to masticate or swallow more food, linseed tea may be resorted to, and in case of irritable cough, the addition of a little honey makes it still more useful. In the latter form it may be given to animals laboring under acute or chronic disease of the urinary apparatus, more especially of the kidneys. To prepare linseed tea, put a couple of handfuls of the seed into a abucket, pour a gallon boiling water upon it. Cover it up a short time, then add a couple of quarts of cold water, when it will be fit for use.—American Veterinary Surgeon.

The Gape-Worm of Fowls.

A correspondent of the Country Gentleman, in reply to a request that some one would "give the natural history of the little worm that causes the gapes in young chickens, writes as follows:

"I will briefly state what is known in regard to this parasite, as I understand the matter. The disease incident to chicks, termed the gapes, is well known by every one who has had any experience in rearing fowls. It is not confined to chickens, but attacks young turkeys, partridges, &c., and often proves very destructive. The worm lives in the windpipe or bronchial tubes, and, by filling up the air passages, causes death by strangulation. These parasites are true worms, and not insects in the larval stage. They are of a reddish brown color, and the body smooth, but having a twisted appearance. The females are very much the larger, becoming about three-fourths of an inch in length when full grown, while the males are only about an eighth of an inch long and very slender. It is said the males are most invariably found firmly united to the females by the reproductive organs, and remain thus permanently attached, making the parasite resemble a twin or branched worm. The eggs or ovules are so minute as to require a microscope for identification; the embryos develop in the oviducts, and the young are liberated from the female's body. The history of these baby worms, after leaving the body of the parent, is unknown; but judging from analogy, they either pass their larval stage in the bodies of insects, or bury themselves in the ground, and are picked up by the fowl and conveyed to the mouth and windpipe. When numbers of these worms become lodged in the windpipe, the chickens show symptoms of the 'gapes' by opening wide their mouths, attempting to swallow, &c., which they do in endeavors to rid themselves of the intruders. These motions resemble gaping in the genus homo, which has given the name of gapes to the disease.—Sometimes as many as two dozen of these worms will be found in the windpipe, and such cases are fatal unless relief is immediately obtained. But the matter of most interest and practical value is the remedy, or how to save the life of the chick. The method recommended is to remove the worms by inserting the tip of the feather into the throat of the patient. Strip a feather except a small portion of the tip, moisten the feather end with some kind of sticky oil, introduce it into the windpipe, twisting it around once or twice, and when it is removed it will usually draw out several of the worms. Repeat, and be sure to burn or otherwise destroy the worms."

Drawing a Lion's Tooth.

The visitors to Mander's menagerie on Wednesday afternoon (says the Glasgow Herald) witnessed a performance no less remarkable than exciting—the extraction of a diseased tooth from the jaw of a vigorous full-grown lion. Some time ago Maccomo, the famous tamer, long connected with Mr. Manders' establishment, had, while causing the animal to perform its usual drill, exposed himself to one of those fierce attacks which, in the course of his perilous occupation, he had notunfrequently faced. Experience had taught him that in such cases a stroke with his rod, delivered on any part of the head produced little effect; that his only chance of escape from the threatened attack lay in a vigorous blow across the jaw or muzzle of the animal. Such a blow had been delivered on the occasion referred to; but while Macomo fortunately succeeded in relieving himself from danger, the lion showed signs of having received considerable injury. Gradually he became low-spirited; he only ate his food with difficulty, and latterly what he did eat required to be cut into small slices. Last week Mr. Manders mentioned his concern for the animal to his family medical adviser in Glasgow—a gentleman who occupies a high place in the profession and in public estimation in the city—and it was suggested in reply that a tooth might have been injured, or the jaw broken, by the blow struck by Maccomo. Further, the doctor volunteered to subject the lion to a surgical operation, provided Mr. Manders could properly secure the animal. After some hesitation, prompted by a consideration for the daring doctor's safety, the offer was accepted, and it was arranged that this altogether novel experiment in dental surgery should be attempted. In the course of the afternoon the fore paws of the lion were caught and bound to the bars of the cage by strong ropes. Afterwards the head was "lassoed," and the ropes were fastened round the animal's neck in such a manner as to prevent, as far as possible, the movement of the head, and to force the mouth close up against the bars. Thus secured, the lion was allowed to exhaust himself by his struggles to shake himself free, and terribly fierce and violent was the rage he displayed. The poor bruto howled frightfully, and the cage shook as if it would go to pieces under stress of the plunging and rearing. When the doctor, accompanied by a medical friend, arrived, he mounted on a tub in front of the cage, and immediately set to work. A piece of wood was placed to the lion's mouth, and at once the beast made a snap. Then a pitchfork was held up, and, placed in the mouth, kept it open, while the inside was thoroughly washed. Afterwards the doctor, pushing his arm between the bars into the lion's mouth, and running his hand over the teeth, found one of the grinders loose, and concluded that this was the cause of the animal's trouble. A terrible struggle ensued, during which every person present, with the exception of the doctor himself, showed great alarm for his safety. The lion plunged more vigorously, and howled more frightfully than ever, tossing his head from side to side, and at times forcing his hinder as well as his front paws against the bars. But ultimately the doctor triumphed over all difficulties and dangers. By means of powerful forceps he extracted the loose tooth, which was found broken and diseased near the root. When the task had been completed the lion sank down completely exhausted, and while he lay steady and quiet the doctor cut the flesh over the jaw, and found the bone severely injured, if not broken. It was, however, deemed inexpedient to subject the beast to another operation, and the excision of the injured bone has accordingly been postponed until it is seen whether it occasions any serious inconvenience. The latest bulletins announce that the monster patient is making satisfactory progress. Meanwhile, the doctor prescribed beef tea and claret, and, under such nourishment, it is to be hoped the lion will soon recover health and vigor. Altogether, including the hour during which the animal was bound before the doctor set to work, the "operation" lasted about an hour and a half.

How to Bring a Lover Back.—Before war had closed the gates, and life was still going on in Paris, a young and pretty woman presented herself at the gallery of a celebrated Paris photographer, and expressed a wish to have a picture taken. As the artist was adjusting the camera, the lady proceeded to pose herself by drawing a pistol and placing it to her temple. "What are you doing, madam?" cried the astonished photographer "I really cannot permit you to blow your brains out here; it would ruin my business; besides, it is a shame to spoil so pretty a face." "I don't intend to do anything of the sort," answered the lady. "My lover has left me, and I wish to send my photograph taken in this position, with word that if he does not soon return to my feet this will be the result." The photographer bowed, and executed the portrait, which it may be hoped duly reached its destination.

☞ It was long supposed that the effect of dipping a razor in hot water was to remove from its edge a kind of resinous substance which was thought to injure its sharpness. Such, however, is not the real effect. The fine edge is given to all blades of steel by tempering them, that is, heating them, and plumping them into cold water. Now, it has been proved by experiment, that the heat of 212 degrees is the exact heat at which razor edges are admirably tempered; and, as the heat of boiling water is 212 degrees, by dipping a razor into it, you, as it were, again temper, or give a new edge to the razor.

☞ Two Emeralders working on a new building were dry, and one bet the other a pint of whiskey that he could not carry him to the roof in his hod. Mike shouldered Pat, and after a slow and painful tugging dumped the precious burden on the roof. "Ah, Mikey, my boy," said Pat, rather crestfallen, "yo've won the bet; but mind yes, as yes was passin' the fourth story yes stumbled, an' I had hopes."
