☞ The unparalleled conflagration which has made Chicago almost a desert of ruin, has been the absorbing theme from one end of our country to the other, during the entire week. The fire commenced on Saturday night, and after tremendous exertions on the part of the firemen, was subdued.

Late on Sunday evening a boy went into a stable on De Koven street, near the river, on the west side, to milk a cow, carrying with him a kerosene lamp.

This was kicked over by the cow, and the burning fluid scattered among the straw. This was the begining of the great fire. A single extinguisher on the ground, or active work by the police in tearing down one or two shanties, would have prevented the spreading of the flames; but the engines were waited for, and when they arrived the firemen, stupefied by their exertions at the first fire, on Saturday night, worked slowly and clumsily. Their efforts were unavailing The wind blew a gale from the southwest.

Rapidly the flames shot from house to house, and from board yard to board yard, having meanwhile crossed the river north of Twelfth street to the south side, and made for the brick and stone business blocks, the railroad freight depots and manufacturing establishments. The full extent of the danger was now realized for the first time.

The fire department, already tired out, worked like heroes, and the mayor and city government, that had supinely rested, now began to exert themselves, but the opportunity had been lost.

The wind blowing a stiff gale had possession of the flames, and the beautiful buildings, Chicago's Glory, lay before them. Harrison, Van Buren, Adams, ...oe and Madison streets were soon ...d, the intervening blocks from the ...Dearborn street on the east being ... Three-quarters of a mile of ...were consumed as by magic. ...hat no sooner had the flame ...n it went directly through, ...minutes sufficed to destroy ...tely built structures.— ... and the very bricks were ... wooden pavements took ...continuous sheet of flame ...y a mile wide. No hu... possibly survive many ...after block fell, and red... higher and higher, and ...nd further, until the north ... sheet of flame, from river ... one time it so hemmed the ... it was expected thousands ...h. The Sherman, Tremont ... hotels were emptied of their

...markable sight was presented in ...rrying throngs, with trunks, sacks ...gs on their shoulders, fleeing amid ... flames for their lives. Those who ...ld made for the surrounding bridges; ...ers got next to the lake shore and to ...ssouth. One block in all the vast business section remained at daylight, viz: the Tribune block. The custom house and Honore blocks, in Dearborn street, had burned, and those who fought the flames here thought at least this block could be saved. A patrol of men, under Samuel Medill, swept off live coals and put out flames inside the walls, and another lot of men under the direction of Hon. Joseph Medill, watched the roofs. At half past seven o'clock this appeared safe, and most of the men went to get rest and feed. A number went to sleep in the Tribune building. But there was a change in the wind.

The flames reached Wabash avenue, State street and Michigan avenue. Soon after McVicker's Theatre caught fire. In a few moments the Tribune building was in flames, and at the last moment the sleeping men were aroused and rescued from the flames. By 10 o'clock in the forenoon this remaining block was in ashes.

Now was to be seen the most remarkable sight ever beheld in this or any country. There were from 50,000 to 75,000 men, women and children fleeing by every available street and alley to the southward and westward, attempting to save their clothing and lives.

Every vailable vehicle was brought into requisition for use, for which enormous prices were paid, and the streets and sidewalks presented a fearful sight.—Thousands of persons and horses, inextricable commingled; poor people, of all colors, shades and every nationality, from Europe, China and Africa, mad with excitement, struggled with each other to get away.

Hundreds were trampled under foot, men and women loaded with bundles and their household goods, to whose skirts were clinging tender infants, half dressed and barefooted, all seeking places of safety. Hours after they might have been seen in vacant lots, or on the streets far out in the suburbs, stretched in the dust.

It is conjectured, with good cause, that near five hundred have been burned to death.

General Description of Chicago.

The city, as is well known, is immediately on the shore of Lake Michigan.—The Chicago river flows into the lake not far from the middle of the city north and south. A little less than a mile from the lake the river divides into branches, which are called respectively the North and South branch. There are thus, as a matter of tact, three divisions of the city, which are recognized in law also, and known as North, South West divisions. Of these the west division is the largest in extent, and contains the most people, but the great bulk of the business of Chicago is done in the south division. Here are the banks, the great hotels, the Boards of Trade, the Chamber of Commerce, the offices of all the daily journals, the great wholesale houses, most of the theatres, the opera house, insurance offices, the apartments of speculators, &c., &c. There are many manufactories in the north and west divisions, but the great active life of Chicago is south of Chicago river between the lake and the South branch. In this space, for a distance of about eight blocks from the main river, the great business operations of the city are performed.—This part of the city has been noted for its great and splendid buildings. Here for many consecutive blocks were vast structures, beautiful in design and wonderfully imposing in general effect. The part of Lake street on this side of the river, and the second street from the principal stream, is not surpassed by any street in America. No part of Broadway for so great a distance is equal to it. At the head of this street on the lake is the great Union Depot, built of stone and iron, and about as large as the Capitol of the United States. Three blocks distant was the Tremont House, larger than any hotel in Washington, now in ruins. The streets crossing this and parallel therewith were all built up with noble structures, magnificent proofs of the enterprising spirit of the citizens of Chicago. One of the crossing streets is the famous Wabash avenue, the most noted city drive of the metropolis, adorned with a thousand beautiful residences and many great churches. Michigan avenue, fronting on the lake, is another. In point of residences this is the Fifth avenue of Chicago.

The north division, near the lake, has many fine residences, which are noted for extensive grounds and elaborate ornamentation by trees and shrubbery. But there are no such great rows of business houses here as on the south side; neither are there on the West side, but this part of the city does much business, and always wears an animated look. Some of the finest residences of the city are here, and also some of the most noted churches. In all parts of the city except the northern part—for, say, three-quarters of a mile from Chicago river—there are many wooden buildings. The city is not, in all parts of it, compactly built. It is about twelve miles long, north and south, and about six miles wide; being, in fact, one of the most extensive cities, in geographical area, in the world. In front of the city is the lake, in rear a vast expanse of prairie. So that, when the winds do blow at Chicago, they blow with great force.

BUTLER'S PROGRAMME.—Politics in Massachusetts seem to be a puzzle.—Wendell Phillips is astonished at Butler's final surrender at Worcester, for, had he run, he thinks he might have been elected by his friends and the labor reformers.—The latter gave him over two hundred delegates, and yet he abandoned the field without even putting a word in the platform for labor reform. Their choice for Governor, it is said, will be Chamberlain, their first standard-bearer, and not Judge Cowley, Wendell Phillips having pronounced for him as the better man of the two. Butler, in the meantime, has recovered from his staggering fall in the State convention, and proposes to address mass meetings in the principal towns of the State, and advocate shortening the hours of labor, with a view to keeping himself before the people, irritating the republican leaders, and breaking their hold on the people. His direct endeavor is to obtain the control of both branches of the Legislature, and perhaps take a hand in its deliberations as a member, since Congress can "spare him." He also wants a hand in the winning Massachusetts cards in the approaching national convention. The man who broke up the democratic convention at Charleston eleven years since may, perhaps, be as successful next year as a republican delegate from the same State.

Building Societies in England.

The spread, which means the success, of these societies, for enabling workingmen in England to secure dwellings of their own, is perfectly surprising. The annual subscriptions to the societies is computed at upward or four millions sterling, and the number of members at a million. One authority estimates the value of the dwellings which have become the property mainly of the working classes by means of these societies at over two hundred millions sterling. The building societies of London alone own about ten millions, divided among one hundred thousand members. In Birmingham there are 13,000 houses belonging to workingmen, who have purchased them through the agency of these societies. Co-operating with the latter are land societies, which buy large estates to sell in lots, thus enabling the workingman to get his lot at very nearly the wholesale price, making an immense difference, sometimes two-thirds, it is said, as compared with going into the market in the ordinary way. The land bought is drained and otherwise prepared for building, and then divided and drawn for by lot by the members of the society, when the building societies come forward and supply the means of erecting dwellings. The moral and social effect of all these societies has been given before a Committee of the House of Commons by the Chief Superintendent of Police at Birmingham, who distinctly says that there are less policemen in Birmingham than there were twenty years ago, although there are some seven miles more streets and sixty thousand more inhabitants. He decidedly attributes it to the habits of temperance and frugality engendered and increased by these societies.

"SOUTH CAROLINA papers assert that there is not a dollar in the State treasury. All the result of radical robbery."—Democratic exchange.

"The committee of seventy in New York is endeavoring to raise money to pay the city laborers. All the result of democratic dishonesty."—National Republican.

Which seems to amount to tit for tat. Outside of the ring of political prejudices, it is easy to see that the human nature of all rogues, of whatever party, is essentially the same. As sweets attract bees, so the strong side always draws to itself those political chevaliers of industry who live upon the public. Whether the honey pot is in South Carolina or New York, the depredators are of the same genus, though not of the same party species. If the people would not be plundered either by State and municipal pickpockets or national highwaymen, they should not content themselves with passing resolutions denouncing fraud and corruption, but go to the polls and elect only responsible and honest men to office, irrespective of party.

A CARD.

I HAVE discovered in my canvass of the County, an impression prevails that, if elected, I intend to place the jail in the possession of a deputy. The impression is wholly without authority from me, for it is, and always has been my purpose to occupy the jail, and devote my personal attention to the discharge of my official duties.

I hope this announcement may be entirely satisfactory to my party and many friends.
