SHE ONLY TOLD WHAT SHE HEARD.

Says Mrs. Brown,
Of Slandertown,
"It may or may not be:
I only tell—
You know me well—
What folks have told to me.

They say that Fife
And his young wife
Get on quite awful, dear;
They scold and fight
Both day and night—
Or that is what I hear.

And who would think
That Smith should drink
The way he does, good Lord!
Or so they say,
My dear, I pray
You will not take my word.

And there's Mrs. Burt,
The saucy flirt,
She's talked about; I heard
Such frightful things,
It blushes brings
To tell them, 'pon my word.

Oh dear, they say
The other day
That Rev. Dr. Bird
And Miss Montcalm
Went arm-in-arm
Down Broadway—so I heard.

Says Mrs. Jones
In chilling tones,
"You have quick ears, my dear;
Just fill them full
With cotton wool;
You hear too much, I fear."

SOIL RESTORATION.

How shall we restore the fertility of our soils? is the question which is discussed by the agricultural press, and which deeply interests the owners and tillers of the fields.

That the soil has lost its fertility and no longer responds generously to the labors of the husbandman, and has ceased to "bring forth fruit abundantly," is implied in the question of restoration of fertility, but is more pointedly evidenced by the fact that when the time and labor necessarily required to prepare the ground and put in the seed have a cash value placed on them, and to these add the cash value of reaping and threshing, as well as the time and labor of transporting to a market, we find that many of our farm products are raised at a loss.

I think it will be conceded that a farmer's time has as much a cash value as has that of the mechanic or skilled artisan. In the foregoing the interest on the capital invested in the land has not been considered, nor the taxes, the former of which, at least, I think should be added to the cost of the crop. In all other means of livelihood or investments these necessarily would be included in estimating "profit and loss," and no other investment would long be pursued which did not only include them, but bring a profit beyond them.

But to turn to the question of restoring the fertility of our soils, let us ask, first, How has the fertility of our soils been removed? The answer is, "By overcropping and not restoring the essentials which have been removed by tillage." This answer is generally accepted by the chemist and agriculturist as full and complete, but I desire to go a step further and assign another cause not less efficient in the reduction of the productiveness of our fields.

When we look at the now thin soil of our fields and contrast it with the deep and rich soil that once covered them, and recall the abundant harvest that once gladdened the heart and lined the pocket of the tiller, should we not ask where is our soil? That it no longer is in our fields is too manifest for argument; but where is it? When we turn to our hillsides and ask where is the soil that once caused them to respond to the labor of the husbandman, we turn to the levels that lie at their base and say the rains have washed it there, and the levels have been enriched at the expense of our hillsides; and are we not correct? Have we not seen the water-courses after the showers that have carried the soil to the levels, and have we not sought for and applied the means to bring to the minimum this gradual washing? When we turn our eyes to the beautiful rivers that are almost now in view, and see that each year the waters are lessening in depth and the shallows are rapidly increasing, can we not, without any stretch of the imagination, answer the question, Where are our soils? by merely pointing to the shallowing streams that are so fast losing their carrying abilities by lacking sufficient depth of water to float the shipping that once carried our produce to a market? Does not the question of How shall we restore the fertility of our soils? involve one, scarcely secondary in importance, of How shall we retain our soils?

The agricultural chemist has told us how to restore our soils, and we gratefully admit our indebtedness to him, but yet must grant that all he has said is not wise, and is sometimes otherwise. He gives us the general principles, which each must take and apply to his own case, not literally as enunciated by the formula, but as his own judgement shall teach him is to be modified by soil and climate. We cannot ignore the wisdom of the chemist nor reject the labors of the manipulator of fertilizers, but custom, wisdom, knowledge and experience must aid our judgement. In nothing that appertains to the improvement of our fields is judgement and wisdom more required than in the application of commercial fertilizers, and the great sales that are annually made the only exceeded by, too often, the greater sale of the purchaser. More intelligence in the use of them, and more freedom in the interchange of views and experience as to results obtained at our meetings, would enlarge our views and perhaps our pocketbooks, indirectly if not directly. To the barnyards and stables we must look for the means of restoring our soils, or rather to keep up their fertility, but really to another source for their restoration.

What constituted the richness of our soils originally? For centuries the foliage of the trees and grasses had fallen and decayed on the ground, enriching the land and giving a deep vegetable mould. No portion was removed, for the leaves annually in falling restored to the earth all and more than the trees had taken for their growth, and the grasses in falling and decaying restored more than they had taken from the ground, and the roots and grasses had so matted and interlaced in the earth that no wash carried the soil to the rivers, and no plow disturbed and loosened the earth, enabling the rains to transfer it to the adjacent streams.

If to vegetable matters which had fallen, decayed and accumulated for years on the lands is due their fertility, then the question seems to simplify itself into this: What is the best and cheapest method of restoring vegetable matter to the soil? The usefulness of clover aided by plaster cannot be questioned, but if the chief point is to restore the vegetable matter, we may well ask if clover is the best in point of economy. If the clover was fed on land—a questionable method—or turned under when in proper state for that purpose, and the temptation to cut and utilize it as feed be foregone, even then, with the high price of seed, it is doubtful if true economy would prompt its use. If we seek a cheap and yet an efficient green manurial plant, we shall find rye to meet the want and supply the article. Seeded in the fall, with or without a fertilizer to give it a start, it will make good growth, supply a fair protection to the soil during the winter, and in the spring, when it has attained a sufficient height, will provide a rich crop to turn under. It may then be followed by one or two crops of buckwheat, to be also turned under, after which, in the fall, the land may be seeded to rye again, and in the spring clover may be sown and the rye allowed to ripen, and the grain and straw will make a handsome return aside from the improved condition of the land, and the coming clover set. Thus we shall have by the rootlets diminished the tendency to wash with winter rains and summer showers, but also have made an advance on the way to restoring our soils and increasing their fertility. Should the land be but indifferently prepared for the seed, and should drought and cold overtake it, still rye will withstand these adverse conditions and still make a very fair crop, and the chinch bug will not molest it.

As a cheap manurial plant, one that can be seeded under unfavorable conditions when wheat would fail, one that is hardy in habits and vigorous in growth, rye cannot be too highly prized, and when allowed to ripen and the grain and straw marketed, when raised as a farm crop it will not only pay a good interest on the time, labor and other expenses in the aggregate better than wheat, but under the continued and judicious growing of it the land can be more steadily improved than, perhaps, in the growth of any other of the small grains.

But not wishing to attempt an exhaustive article, I will say that the restoration of the fertility of our soils and the reduction of the wash to the least amount must be largely due to the restoring to the fields vegetable mould, and on the portions most liable to be washed back in sod, that the roots may hold the earth, as is practiced on an embankment of earthworks by the Government in the sodding of the slopes.

No one article, probably, can be more economically used or more strongly recommended than rye to fulfil the indications suggested in this paper.—American Farmer.

ACCORDING to the Express of Atlanta, Texas, the champion wielder of the pistol in a close fight is Capt. Joe Peevy, formerly a citizen of Arkansas, residing close to the Choctaw line. He was a Deputy United States Marshal for a long time, and often had the command of a posse when that was more dangerous business than it is in New York. During the war he was arrested by Federal troops on the charge of being a spy, court-martialed, and sentenced to be shot. He made his escape, from that time until the downfall of the Confederacy his name and daring deeds were well known in both armies. Seventy men have fallen at the report of his pistol, and yet in all his personal encounters he was known only once to be wounded, and that was while trying to arrest a desperado in the Indian Territory. Capt. Peevy is now a citizen of Oregon, where he is reported to have killed five roughs who attacked him. Yet with all this he is said to be a pleasant companion and an unswerving friend.

THE example set by Mrs. Brassey now Lady Brassey in issuing in a sixpenny form a complete reprint, including the wood cuts, of her charming voyage round the world, is about to be followed in no less a direction than royalty itself. The life of the Prince Consort is about to be issued in unabridged and similar form for popular reading. It was originally published at a guinea a volume in five volumes. There is so much of the personality of the Prince, and indeed of the whole royal family throughout the work—matters which have the highest attractions for the middle classes of England—that the sale of the book will be enormous.

MR. CHARLES DARWIN'S most recent book treats of the vegetable mould through the action of worms. "We have seen," he says, discussing their mental qualities, "that worms are timid. It may be doubted whether they suffer as much pain when injured as they seem to express by their contortions. Judging by their eagerness for certain kinds of food they must enjoy the pleasure of eating. Their sexual passion is strong enough to overcome for a time their dread of light. They perhaps have a trace of social feeling, for they are not disturbed by crawling over each others bodies." The intelligence of worms has been made the subject of prolonged and profound study by Mr. Darwin. The great philosopher has occupied whole days and nights in observing "mere worms," which to non-naturalists are regarded as supremely unimportant.

PRINCE BISMARCK'S mother is described, and the description is approved by Bismarck himself as correct, as having been a tall, graceful, amiable, and altogether charming woman, but with all this possessing a notable expression of decision and firmness. She had a steady eye and hand, and was an excellent pistol shot.

THE ministers of the California town of Los Angelos have signed an agreement that they will in no case perform the marriage ceremony for divorced persons, "except the divorce be obtained on scriptural grounds, and then for the innocent party only."
